there been an accurate examination? Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from Connecticut that there has been a very accurate and careful examination of the necessary cost of these repairs. I have before me a detailed statement of sary cost of these repairs. I have before me a detailed statement of the expenditures of last year covering every item. Last year there was expended in all eighteen thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight dollars and some odd cents for this purpose. The War Department assures us from correspondence with the proper officers of the academy that the sum of $14,500 is absolutely necessary to maintain the buildings in proper condition. I have somewhere the statement of the Secretary of War upon that point, but I cannot lay my hand on it at this moment. The subject was very carefully and thoroughly examined, I will say to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. EATON. It strikes me as a very simplar fact that there should

Mr. EATON. It strikes me as a very singular fact that there should be any difference of opinion between the Senator from Iowa and any member of the House committee in regard to the absolutely necessary repairs upon the buildings at West Point. Certainly, there ought I do not desire to interpose any objection to the appropriation of a sufficient sum of money to take the necessary care of all the buildings of that institution.

Mr. ALLISON. I now lay my hand upon the memorandum, and if the Senator from Connecticut will hear it read I will send it to the

Mr. EATON. I do not care to hear it. If the Senator has the information, that is all I require.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was on page 4 line 70, to increase the appropriation "for the compensation of the clerk to disbursing officer and quartermaster" from "$1,200" to "$1,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 4 after line 70, to insert the following:

For clerk to adjutant, $1,500. For clerk to treasurer, $1,500.

Mr. EATON. I should like to know the necessity for this. I imagined that the honorable Senator from Iowa preferred to give $1,500 instead of $1,200 to one clerk, and therefore I did not care about interposing any objection to the amendment just agreed to; but here is an addition of $3,000 for two employes which the other branch of Congress did not suppose were necessary.

Mr. ALLISON. The clerk to the adjutant is also clerk of the aca-Mr. ALLISON. The clerk to the adjutant is also clerk of the academic corps, keeps the books and records of the academic corps, and is really the clerk to the Military Academy. The officers of the academy say this clerk is absolutely essential to the proper conduct of the business of the academy. If a separate appropriation is not made for the purpose, a clerk will be employed and paid out of the ordinary pay given to the cadets. This clerkship, I believe, was established in 1826, and a clerk has been kept there performing those duties continuously from that time until now. It is said that we cannot get along without this officer. I do not see myself how we can very well dispense with him. The clerk to the treasurer keeps the individual accounts of the cadets. Of course he is obliged to keep an accurate account of all their expenditures. There being on an average three hundred and ten cadets at the academy, it seems to me his services are absoand ten cadets at the academy, it seems to me his services are absolutely necessary. Therefore the committee have inserted these two

Mr. EATON. I am not quite satisfied with the explanation. does not seem to me that another committee who have examined this matter with great thoroughness could have made two mistakes of this character. If it were unnecessary that there should be two clerks—for clerk to adjutant, $1,500; for clerk to treasurer, $1,500—what necessity is there that the treasurer of that institution should have a clerk? I do not know but that he ought to do the business himself.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Secretary to read on page 6 of the statement I send to the desk the lines that I have marked. I think the explanation there given will satisfy the Senator from Connecticut.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Forty-one and forty-two. The clerk to the adjutant and the clerk to the treasurer, estimated for each at $1.500 but stricken out by the committee, are so very necessary for the proper conduct of business at the academy, that their retention cannot be too strongly urged. Enlisted men suitable for the duties cannot be had, and such duties have relation to the academy and not to the post of West Point. There has been a clerk to the adjutant of the academy ever since 1936, and one has been regularly provided for since 1834. He is in no sense a secretary to the adjutant. He is required to keep all the records relating to the cadets, to make out rolls and returns, and to record the proceedings of the academic board; and there has never been found an enlisted man who could, even temporarily, supply his place. Attention is invited to the letter of the adjutant, Colonel Robert H. Hall, appended, marked A.

The treasurer's clerk has also been recognized since 1833. He is the book-keeper for cadets' accounts. An account is kept with each cadet, and his duties cover the preparation of returns and all other transactions that fall within the province of the treasurer, whose business relates to the affairs of the cadets, and who also performs the duty of an instructor. Even if the duties of a book-keeper could with propriety be expected of this officer, he has no time to perform them, and an assistant is absolutely necessary. His principal responsibility is the care of and accountability for the money received from the paymaster on account of cadets, and the disbursement thereof under orders and regulations.

Mr. MAXEY. The fact is that the cadets never draw that money at all. Their entire accounts are kept as stated in the paper that has just been read at the desk; and when you consider that there is a cadet appointed by every member of the House of Representatives and every Delegate from a Territory, that there are ten from the United States at large, and all those accounts have to be kept for every item of expenditure, however small, by each cadet, the cadet not drawing any money, it becomes apparent that the services of a clerk are necessary. Until I heard the statement read a moment ago, however, I did not know what was the amount of his salary; but I am quite satisfied with its correctness.

Mr. EATON. It does not manifestly appear to me, as it manifestly appears to the Senator from Texas, nor do I believe that the treasurer cannot keep his own accounts while sitting in his arm-chair at

Mr. ALLISON. The treasurer is also an instructor at the academy,

Mr. ALLISON. The treasurer is also an instructor at the academy, and is constantly employed.

Mr. EATON. If he is constantly employed in doing something else, then the clerk had better be called the treasurer, it seems to me. However, I see my friends are determined that there shall be no retrenchment here under any circumstance, and all I can do is to vote against these amendments.

Mr. SARGENT: In reply to the remark of my friend from Connecticut I would like to say that the committee themselves considered that in this bill they had cut off every dollar that could be spared. There is retrenchment in the bill, and we did not go further because we thought that to do so would be injurious to the service.

Mr. EATON. I have no doubt that the Senate Committee on Appropriations have done what they considered to be right; but what suited them, or what they believed to be right, may not suit me. Therefore I am opposed to the amendments.

of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to; there being on a division-ayes

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was on page 5, after the word "dollars," in line 101, in the appropriation for department of chemistry, mineralogy, and geology, to insert the Pay of mechanic employed in chemical and geological section rooms and in lecture room, $1,050.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 5, line 108, in the appropriation for department of natural and experimental philosophy, to increase the item "for additions to the apparatus to illustrate the laws in mechanics, optics, and acoustics" from $600 to $1,000, and to insert at the end of the paragraph the words—

For pay of mechanic, $1,000

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 6, line 120, to strike out "one" and insert "two," and at the end of the paragraph of the appropriations for department of law to insert:

Provided, That the professor of law may be commissioned in the same manner as the other professors.

So that the clause will read:

For text-books and stationery and books of reference for the use of instructors, $200: Provided, That the professor of law may be commissioned in the same manner as the other professors.

The amendment was agreed to.

the Senate will not strike it out.

The next amendment was on page 7, line 151, to increase the pay of librarian's assistant from $120 to $1,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 20, noes 23.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say one word in explanation of this amendment. The adjutant of the post is the librarian. Of course his duties are the ordinary duties of an adjutant, having care of the four companies and of the post. An assistant must be employed who will be constantly in the library receiving and delivering books to the students and others entitled to them. If I may state what occurred in the minds of the House committee, they supposed that an enlisted soldier or a sergeant could discharge these duties, but on examination it is found that a librarian or an assistant librarian is actually necessary at the post; one who is familiar with the books, who will be assistant normal is actually necessary at the post; one who is familiar with the books, who will be constantly present delivering books to students, receiving books from them, and keeping an accurate record of the operations of the library. That is the sole reason why we have changed this appropriation for an assistant librarian which has existed for a number of years. I trust

Mr. EATON. The Senator from Iowa informs the Senate that the adjutant is a librarian. We have just added $1,500 that the House committee did not think was necessary, for a clerk to that officer. Now, then, let the clerk attend to the duties of the adjutant; the adjutant is the librarian. The Senate have seen fit to give that officer a clerk and to pay the clerk $1,500. Let him attend to the duties of his principal when his principal is otherwise engaged. I trust the Senate will not adopt the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the Senator from Connecticut is correct in his

Mr. DAVIS. I think the Senator from Connecticut is correct in his conclusions, and that his view of the case did not occur to the Senate committee. At least, it was not stated in committee. My own impression is that the clerk that we have given to the adjutant should take the place of the assistant librarian, and that this provision ought to be stricken out entirely. It should not be granted, even at the $120 which the House put in. The House added $120 because they reduced the clerk to the adjutant, and I think the Senate was right, when, on a division a moment ago, it refused to agree with the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bruce, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conkling, Dorsey, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Jones of Nevada, Logan, Maxey, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Paddock, Robertson, Sargent, Spencer, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—25.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE. At the proper time, for I suppose it will not be in order until the vote shall have been taken upon the amendments proposed by the committee, I shall move to strike out this whole clause in the bill. It should not be there at all. As I understand, it is an indirect way of increasing the salary of the Superintendent at the academy. The appropriation might be styled "for wining visitors at the West Point Academy," and these words would perhaps indicate more thoroughly the purpose for which the appropriation is made. It is intended for entertainment. The Superintendent at the academy ought not to be obliged to entertain anybody who visits that institution. If he chooses to entertain people, he should do so at his own and not at the public expense. I therefore think that no appropriation whatever ought to be made for that purpose; least of all should it be increased from $200 to $1,000. Mr. ALLISON. This is an appropriation that has found its way into our appropriation bills for many years. The House reduced the sum of $1,000 to $200. I quite agree with the Senator from Maryland that if the sum is to be reduced at all, it ought to be stricken out entirely. The idea of appropriating the sum of $200 for contingencies to the Superintendent of the academy, it seems to me, is rather too small. The Committee on Appropriations believed that this year especially The Committee on Appropriations believed that this year especially it would be rather important that the Superintendent of the academy should have a contingent fund, and they do not think the sum of $1,000 is too large. That is all there is to it.

Mr. WEST. I should like to have read the remarks in the statement in regard to this subject which I have marked. If the Senator from Maryland will give his attention he will see what the proposition is tion is.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Secretary read as follows:

The Appropriation Committee propose a reduction of $500 on the estimate of $1,000 for contingencies of Superintendent. The allowance of $1,000 for contingencies heretofore given the Superintendent, and of which the last year's Board of Visitors, including the Congressional committees, recommended an increase, (see page 16, Board of Visitors' report), was given by Congress to enable the Superintendent to meet extra expenses for entertainment. The recommendation referred to was given without the solicitation or knowledge of the Superintendent, who expresses the opinion that it would be preferable to have nothing for such purpose unless the amount was sufficient to be substantial. The allowance was intended for an increase of pay, under another name, to the Superintendent, to enable him to perform the requirements of courtesy and hospitality becoming the position. He could not do so on the pay of a colonel, and the office of Superintendent confers no emolument upon the present incumbent, who receives now only the allowances to which he would be entitled were he commanding an ordinary military post in any part of our country, and by the provisions of the bill as submitted will receive less, as the proposed bill deprives him, as well as other officers, of longevity pay while at West Point. Therefore, unless the amount is substantial, it would be better to strike it out entirely, as in that event none of the courtesies looked for by distinguished visitors from home and abroad could be extended to him, beyond what could be done on his pay proper.

Mr. WEST. I am not aware exactly when this allowance was

Mr. WEST. I am not aware exactly when this allowance was originally instituted. Perhaps the Senator from Iowa can state when; but at all events it has been the usage for years to make some allowance to the Superintendent of the Military Academy. The recent Congressional committee and the late Board of Visitors, who examined into the matter, expressed an opinion that, instead of being reduced or abated, the amount should be increased. Such appropriations and such allowances are quite common throughout the civil service of the United States and it is for the Contraction. service of the United States, and it is for the Senate to consider whether in dispensing the hospitality incident to the position of the commanding officer of that place, he has any claim upon the public for an allowance. We all know that a number of visitors from all sections of the Union, and during this centennial year undoubtedly from Europe, will visit the institution, and it were better not to attempt any hospitality to be shown them at all unless we do it upon a scale commensurate to their deserts. The appropriation is no new one. It is a continued one, and it is simply for the Senate to say whether they will extend their idea of economy in that direction at the present time, when of all others it would seem there was the greater necessity for the fund, because unquestionably the calls and demands upon that officer's hospitality and courtesy will in this centennial year be greater than ever before. Should we next year see proper to reduce it, it could be urged with much more propriety than it can to-day amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. COOPER. I shall vote for the amendment upon the idea that if any such fund be appropriated at all, it ought to be more than that appropriated by the House; but when the question comes up I shall vote for the amendment suggested by the Senator from Maryland against any appropriation for this purpose whatever.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment reserved will now

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment reserved is to strike the following words:

For sixteen musicians for companies, $2,496: Provided, That sections 9 and 10 of the act approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for fiscal years ending June 30, 1875, and prior years, and for other purposes," be, and the same are, repealed.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For pay of Military Academy band, $14,880.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senate has disagreed to the bill as it came to us from the House of Representatives, and struck out the words read by the Clerk, which provide among other things for sixteen musicians at a compensation of $2,496. It will be seen that that is but a little over $150 apiece. Consequently they must be enlisted men. They must be there for some purpose and paid in some other way and independent of the amount appropriated for them by the House bill in this clause. In the Book of Estimates we find the same amount asked for their support. It must be extra compensation to their pay as enlisted men.

The point is that these sixteen musicians have been, perhaps ever since 1812, a part of the institution. They are provided for by the Revised Statutes, as will be found on page 226, section 1322. If we leave those unprovided for, may not the question arise—which was leave those unprovided for, may not the question arise—which was argued with a great deal of force, and I admit most of us were afraid the opposite side of the House were correct—that the parties being left without the pay which had been provided for by law would still have a just claim against the Government? If that be so, then these men will be there to do nothing, probably, and still have their pay. What I want to call the attention of the Senate to, and especially of the Senator from Iowa who has charge of this bill, is whether he had not better in some way provide for the sixteen musicians fixed by law: and if he wishes to continue the had proper which is not prolaw; and if he wishes to continue the band proper, which is not provided for by any statute, he had better drop sixteen of the band, which can be done very well and violate no statute. The Senate has decided that forty shall be the entire number. As it stands now, if I am correct that the sixteen will be retained, there will be fifty-six men in the band.

I throw out the suggestion for the consideration of the Senator from Iowa, who has the bill in charge, not making any objection to what the Senate has done, but desiring to prevent the duplication of sixteen musicians.

Mr. ALLISON. I find on examination of the statutes that section Mr. ALLISON. I and on examination of the statutes that section 1322 of the Revised Statutes provides for four musicians to each company of cadets. These musicians are enlisted men, as I understand, in the Army, and they are paid as enlisted men. I do not think it is necessary to appropriate for these musicians, who are simply fifers and drummers and attached to the companies when they are on drill. Therefore, whether that clause is in or out, these musicians will be enlisted men and will be attached to these companies for duty. On examination, the Senator having called my attention to the subject privately, I do not think it is necessary to make any provision in reference to it. Of course this band is a very different thing from the company musicians. The company musicians are usually private enlisted soldiers and attached to the companies of cadets.

Mr. DAVIS. According to the view of the Senator from Iowa, who has the bill in charge, there would be fifty-six instead of forty, as has been provided for. Is that his view?

been provided for. Is that his view?

Mr. ALLISON. These cadets are required to drill each day, and to be divided into companies. Of course these companies will have attached to them soldiers, enlisted men, who are musicians, and those musicians will be a different class of persons from the musicians comprising the band, as I understand; but the band itself will continue as provided for by the statute of 1875.

Mr. DAVIS. It seems to me that there is a difficulty there; but probably the best way will be to let it go to a conference committee, as it is almost sure to go there, and there it can be remedied probably as well as here.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator that, if there is any difficulty about it, it can be arranged in a conference committee.

Mr. MAXEY. I stated yesterday evening that the corps of cadets is organized into a battalion of four companies, A, B, C, and D. By law there are attached to each of these companies four musicians. They are not enlisted other than in obedience to the law as attaching company musicians to each of these companies—two drummers and two fifers. In company drill these drummers and fifers perform duties with the companies. When the four companies are thrown together into battalion, then the field-music, made up of drummers and fifers, accompanies the band. These drummers and fifers sound every call from reveille in the morning until tattoo at night. Throughout the entire day there are calls requiring absolutely a sound, and that comes from this field-music. There is an orderly detailed from the field-music every day to perform that service. The duties of the field music are entirely distinct and dissimilar from those of the band.

In addition to the duties which I have stated the field-music has certain other duties to perform. When the battalion is called out for purposes of review, for dress-parade, or for battalion drill, then the band comes out, and it is in connection with the battalion as such that the band performs its duties. It is in connection with the companies as such that the four musicians belonging to each company perform their duties and then when the battalion is thrown together as such they go along as field-music, in addition to which they sound all the calls from reveille to tattoo. That is the purpose of them, and they are not provided for as enlisted men other than by virtue of the law which assigns these four men, or four boys as they really are, to each one of the companies as musicians.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from Texas has stated probably more clearly than I could about what I desired to say myself. One further proposition I wish to suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill. understood him, although I did not hear him, to say that he did not care anything about this appropriation as applicable to those musicians whom I denominate as the drum corps.

Mr. ALLISON. I simply said that, this appropriation being struck out, these musicians would be enlisted men and assigned to these cadet ompanies for duty, as I suppose.

Mr. LOGAN. They are enlisted men now, are they not?

Mr. ALLISON. I so understand they are, and therefore they will be provided for in the regular Army bill.

Mr. LOGAN. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. Those attached to the West Point Academy are provided for in the Military Academy bill always, and paid out of the appropriations in the Military Academy bill, the appropriation made for musicians, and when we say emy bill, the appropriation made for musicians, and when we say musicians we mean drummers and fifers. Under the laws regulating the Army, musicians are always entitled to higher pay than the private soldiers in all organizations. Hence this amount appropriated to pay these musicians is just as necessary in this bill as it is in the Army appropriation bill to pay the drummers and fifers of the Army. I do not remember exactly their pay, but it is more than that of a private soldier. They are paid as musicians.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not understand that it is.

Mr. LOGAN. But I do.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, this discussion about the band reminds me of an occurrence in the Legislature of Pennsylvania a great many years ago, perhaps before most of the Senators now present came to this country. Somebody made a motion to have the militia re-organized, and there was quite a discussion about it. One old fellow by the name of Fulmer, from the county of Northumberland, who had been out in the revolutionary war, said he was opposed to this bill for re-organizing the militia. He said, "When I was in the war we were glad to have drums and fifes; and I shall not agree that the government of this State shall spend its money to send out organs with the militia of this State." [Laughter.] He was a wise man in his generation, and the bill was voted down. I remember having that in my mind once upon an occasion when I had some authority in this Government and there came up a question about bands for the different regiments then being brought into the service of the United States. It was about 1861, a period that most of the people now living remember something about. Remembering old Fulmer, I said "These bands are useless things; the money they cost is wasted, and it is giving a preference to idle fellows to go about and blow their trumpets when other men are firing their guns and fighting to save their lives." After much trouble, I got the bands reduced; but after a while there came a reverse; there was a contest not far from here at a place called Bull Run and our people were driven from their intrenchments and driven back toward Washington when they came to Washington every one was frictabled and ton. When they came to Washington every one was frightened out of his wits. The rebels living here were afraid that we would punish them and they ran off, and some of our people were afraid the rebels would get hold of us and they ran off. So the city was in great distress. Then I said to the Adjutant-General "For God's sake bring some music here. I do not know how we shall raise the spirits of these people unless we get some bands." Said he, "I have no appropriation for music." "Well," said I, "I authorize you to spend for me $10,000 if you will get one or two or three bands to come and thump their drums and blow their fifes and their horns and so on all around this city," but the music had run off with the rest.

Now, to cut down the band or the appropriation for music is, I think, economizing in a very small way. The music is of great service in time of war, as I learned after the time to which I have referred. After a battle the musicians are the men who carry around the stretchers, who gather up the wounded from the battle-field, who nurse the wounded, and take care of them until they can be taken into the place where the surgeons receive them. No class of men bring more comfort to the wounded soldier than the musician when he is performing his duty as a musician by cheering him up. Every man fights better after hearing the band play, and every man upon a retreat is cheered when he hears martial music under the flag of his country. To cut off the music is the last reform I would make. It may be an ornament, but I think it is a graceful ornament to all your posts. Scarcely anywhere does it cost anything, for the expenses of the band are generally paid out of the savings from the mess; the drippings, if you choose so to style them, which would be wasted, are put to use and make up the pay of the musicians.

Who is there that would be willing to go to West Point and find it shorn of its music because a few thousand dollars are expended to pay the musicians? There is not a man in the Senate who is not prouder when he goes there and hears patriotic music so well performed by the band paid and taken care of by the Government. I heard my friend, the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. Bogy,] yesterday talking about the Marine Band. I am sure that when he used to come here in the days when he was young and graceful—he is graceful yet—and when he dauced to the music of that band, he was proud and glad to say to everybody, "It is the finest band in the world." I never heard him say so; but I am sure he must have said it a hundred times. Now, when he is old, or imagines he is old, he may begin to think that music is of no account; but I would advise him that he needs it now more than he ever did. He ought not, nor ought anyneeds it now more than he ever did. He ought not, nor ought any-body else, to refuse to vote this pittance to pay these men who under-stand so well and perform so well their duty as musicians. I will vote to save ten times as much, twenty times as much, in the staff of the Army, if you like. I think we have a greater staff than is needed. I believe that the Commissary and Quartermaster's Departments could be put in one. I believe that there ought to be no generals, or brigadier-generals, or brevet officers in the staff. The staff officers ought to be portions of the regiments; the commissaries and the quarter-masters ought to be portions of the regiments. masters ought to be portions of the regiments; and then a single head here, with the rank of colonel, as it was before the war, would be enough to take care of the Commissary and Quartermaster's Departments. There is your waste. It is in consequence of the brevets, which were bestowed so liberally, so outrageously liberally, if that can be, at the end of the war on everybody, and the pensions by retired pay given to men who were only captains, because they happened to serve in the grades of colonel, or brigadier-general, or major-general for a few days. There is the wasta. Your money is not wasted by what you give to the poor man of taste and of some educa-tion who happens to enlist in the Army as a musician. I am against all this little economy. Let us go to the head. Let us reduce our own pay, if you will, down to $8 a day, as it was a few years ago. I am perfectly willing to agree to that; but I am not willing to take one cent from the music of the Army.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I desire to make an inquiry of some of the friends of this bill. There are two bands provided for here, or two distinct musical organizations. I think that there is but one band, strictly speaking, as a band technically so termed; but in addition to this band are there not sixteen musicians called company musicians? The Senator from Illinois, I presume, can inform me.

Mr. LOGAN. There are.

Mr. LOGAN. There are.

Mr. BOGY. If that be so, what has this big band of fifty-six musicians to do? When do they blow their horns; on what occasion; for what purpose? I should like to know. The others appear to do all the hard work; they do all the company work, and the companies include the whole. Now, when do these higher fellows—these scientific, educated gentlemen spoken of by my friend from Pennsylvania—toot on all these different horns, the Hungarian, the French, the Italian, and so on? I should like to know.

Mr. LOGAN. That depends on the regulations; but I presume they are not like we are; they do not toot on all occasions. [Laughter.] They do it when it is desired that they shall. I do not want to discuss this band question again; but I believe the Senator was a to discuss this band question again; but I believe the Senator was a to discuss this band question again; but I believe the Senator was a soldier once himself.

Mr. BOGY. I was in the Black Hawk war.

Mr. LOGAN. They did not have any bands in the Black Hawk war, except bands of Indians; some of that aristocracy.

Mr. BOGY. We had drums.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator objects to the aristocracy of the drum.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator objects to the aristocracy of the drum. The Senator I suppose may go to West Point or any post of the Army where a band exists, (I do not mean a band according to law, for no band exists under our law except at West Point, so far as the Army is concerned,) and he would find the music very delightful at the raising of the flag in the morning and at the lowering of the flag in the evening, on dress-parades, and on the different occasions when the band is called out for the purpose of giving music. I do not remember exactly the times, but on all occasions where it is required music is given. But this drum corps that I speak of is an entirely different institution. If the Senator examines the law he will find it to be the fact that every company of infantry in the Army is entitled to two musicians and that every company of cavalry is entitled to a bugler. They have certain kinds of musicians belonging to all parts of the Army. The artillery are entitled to a musician of a certain kind; so of the cavalry, and so of the infantry. The infantry have a drum and fife, and these musicians are provided for in the law.

The cadets are merely in training for soldiers, and in the training of soldiers it is absolutely necessary to have music. As was well stated by the Senator from Texas, [Mr. Maxey,] there are different calls in camp and out of camp that are made with the drum and fife; calls in camp and out of camp that are made with the drum and fire; for instance, to call the company together for parade. The sick-call, for instance, in the morning, for soldiers to appear for the purpose of having an examination by the surgeon. That is the case among soldiers of the Army. I do not know how it is at West Point; but there are various calls there. In the morning the reveille, and different calls by drum and fife, which are absolutely necessary in the Army. This is just as necessary at West Point in the training of the cadets as it is in the training of a private soldier in the Army. There is skirmish drill, and there are different kinds of drills and maneuvers. There are maneuvers of cavalry where an officer wants to parade his There are maneuvers of cavalry where an officer wants to parade his cavalry, so that he may not give his command, but that it may be understood and heard at a great distance. They are trained so as to make their movements by the sound of the horn, and different sounds make their movements by the sound of the horn, and different sounds are given for the purpose of making different movements.

Music is an absolute necessity. If you abolish the drum and fife at West Point you may as well abolish them in the Army. Their use is just as necessary there as it is in any camp or post in the Army. Therefore I object to striking out the pay for this drum corps. I said a while ago that the musicians in the Army were paid higher prices than privates. In some instances they are. So far as the infantry is concerned, I see by the law they are not; but a musician of cavalry is paid $22 a month, and a musician of artillery is paid $22 a month. is paid $22 a month, and a musician of artillery is paid $22 a month. Drummers and fifers of artillery are paid $13 a month. They are provided for in the law. I desire to say to the Senator from Iowa in reference to these men that I think he is laboring under a mistake when he says they are paid by the appropriation bill for the Army. These musicians at West Point are not recognized in the organization of the Army, but in the organization of West Point. Hence they are paid in the appropriations for West Point the same as the musicians are paid in the Army by law, and as money is appropriated to pay the private soldiers and officers of the Army. It is a separate thing, entirely distinct, and therefore these sums are paid by different appropriation bills. Hence the provision ought to be in this bill, and not in the general appropriation bill for the Army, for that does not apply to West Point.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it very likely that the Senator from Illinois is correct in his statement; but the committee were misled by a memorandum furnished at the War Department. I also find, however, among my papers a reference to section 1322 of the Revised Statutes, which seems to indicate that the Senator from Illinois is correct in his statement, and that these musicians are provided for separately; but this matter can be arranged in the conference com-

Mr. LOGAN. That is true; but the conference committee might not agree. It will be seen by a reading of the law in reference to the corps of cadets at West Point that—

The corps of cadets shall be arranged into companies according to the directions of the Superintendent, each of which shall be commanded by an officer of the Army, for the purpose of military instruction. To each company shall be added four musicians.

To each company of what? To each company of cadets at West Point. Now, to each company in the Army are added two musicians, and to each company of cadets at West Point are added four musicians. They are a part of the organization at West Point for the instruction of the cadets. Hence they are a part of this bill, should remain in it, and not be stricken out.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I suggest to the Senator that after we agree to this amendment he can insert afterward, "for sixteen musicians for companies, $2,496," and that will accomplish the purpose.

Mr. LOGAN. That will accomplish it of course. Whatever the amount of pay is ought to be inserted. Of course that will accomplish it.

Mr. ALLISON. Or there is another mode. Strike out the proviso only, leaving all of lines 35 and 36 up to the word "provided." That will cover the case.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes. While we are speaking about this, let me refer

Mr. LOGAN. Yes. While we are speaking about this, let me refer to the fact that the Senator from Missouri said he did not understand why this is so. If the Senator will allow me to read the section of the law he will see exactly the reason for this drum corps; not for the horns he talks about, but for the drum corps.

That is, the corps of cadets-shall be taught and trained in all the duties of a private soldier, non-commissioned officer, and officer, shall be encamped at least three months in each year, and shall be taught and trained in all the duties incident to a regular camp.

There is the reason why the drum and fife are required at West Point. The cadets are in camp for three months of the year to be trained in the duties of the private soldier; that is, they carry the musket, learn the manual of arms, stand guard, do camp duty and everything of that kind that pertains to a private soldier in camp. I should hate very much to see them deprived of that which is absolutely necessary to make the necessary calls in camp for the soldier-to see them deprived of the drum and fife.

Mr. MAXEY. I will state as an additional fact that the corps of cadets perform guard duty and that they perform guard duty during the entire year. Guard mounting takes place every morning during the entire academic year as well as during the encampment.

Mr. LOGAN. In guard mounting in the morning and in relieving the guard afterward, it is always done to the drum and fife in every camp

Mr. MAXEY. And throughout the entire academic year guard mounting takes place precisely as during the encampment period.

Mr. BOGY. I think I am learning something on this subject. I do not wish my friends on the right or on the left to think that I am warring against the fife and the drum. I have been in favor of the fife and the drum from the beginning, but I am against this large, big band of wind instruments. Will my friend from Illinois tell me big band of wind instruments. Will my friend from Illinois tell me what call is made by this big fiddle called the basso, so large that you have got to put it down and play on the reverse? What military call is made by that instrument? Do you know, sir?

Mr. LOGAN. It calls sinners to repentance. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOGY. I hope my friend will experience the beneficial effects of that call. Then what is the use of the trombone in a military way?

Will the Senate tell me?

Will the Senator tell me? Mr. LOGAN. It is a strange question for a Frenchman to ask an

Mr. BOGY. That may be; but I should like to see an American who can answer a question.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know that I care about being interrogated on the subject of musical instruments. I am not a musical instrument myself. [Laughter.] I expect I know as little about them, perhaps, as the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BOGY. I desire to place myself right. I see from the Senator's bad temper that he misunderstands me.

Mr. LOGAN. Not bad temper. The Senator is very much misteleer.

Mr. BOGY. I suppose the temper is bad because the Senator says what he could not have said in a good temper. Therefore he must have been in bad temper.

Mr. LOGAN. I certainly did not say anything that indicated bad

Mr. BOGY. It certainly was in bad temper. But, sir, it comes to

Mr. LOGAN. When I said "Frenchman," if that is what the Senator takes exception to, it was certainly playfully said. I did not mean any offense by it.

Mr. BOGY. I take no exception to it at all. My exception is only to the manner, not to the matter. I only wish to say that, although these instruments may be of some use to indicate certain movements of an army, as the bugle to the cavalry, most of these instruments are purely for the amusement of the cadets of West Point in their social purely for the amusement of the cadets of West Point in their social relations, and I say that we ought not to require the people of the United States to pay for that amusement. That is all. The fife and the drum are all right; but the basso, fiddle, and the trombone, and the triangle, and the Hungarian bugle, brought over by the Asiatics when they first invaded Europe in Hungary, (for the same old instrument is preserved in our Army, now called the Hungarian bugle,) are of no use at the present day. They can be of no use in our Army, and I wish the fact to go before the country that the money of the people is being expended for these useless things.

Music is well enough, but I do not think that we should furnish music for the mere amusement of the persons who happen to be at music for the mere amusement of the persons who happen to be at West Point. It ought to be known to the country that we are educating a class of young men at the expense of the people, who, while being educated, are under the heavy pay of forty-five to fifty dollars a month, so that with that money they can pay for their food and for their clothing, but these young men are fed and clothed at the public expense. In addition to that, this music is furnished to them. In addition to that, a course of education preparing them alone for civil life and not for military life is furnished to them.

These are my objections, and I do not intend to trifle with the subject, and I did not mean to be trifled with when I asked the question to what purpose could these instruments be put in this band, and the Senator could not answer it. I did not expect he could. I anticipated from his military experience that he could not, because the question cannot be properly answered. These bands are furnished merely as a means of amusement to the young gentlemen who are paid to go to West Point to be educated, a large portion of whom resign soon after they are educated. That is my objection.

I remember to have read that in the French Emperor's celebrated I remember to have read that in the French Emperor's celebrated retreat from Moscow music played a conspicuous part, and that his own wonderful spirits never gave way until his music was destroyed. The wind instruments, these chaps who blow on all these various horns, of course were soon played out; in that cold climate they could not blow very long and those instruments were very soon stopped. One at a time it was reported that such a band had stopped. The emperor showed great anxiety that the music should be kept up, knowing very well that as long as the music could be kept up by which this army, which had been collected from various parts of Europe, not alone from France, but from all parts of Europe, could be reminded of the airs of their own home, of their own fireside, it would inspire them with hope and courage; and he knew human uature so well that he knew it was important to maintain that spirit; ture so well that he knew it was important to maintain that spirit; and history tells us that when he was informed that all the bands were destroyed he pronounced it the greatest calamity which had happened to the army. But finally he inquired, "Is there a drum and a fife left?" They told him yes, the drums and fifes were all safe. "Then," said he, "we have music enough." Finally the fife troze out and he was left alone with the drum; and that is said to be the

I see provided in your bill here an appropriation to pay for a teacher of music at West Point. He had a teacher of music with his army, and he sent for the teacher of music, explained to him the organization of the army and the importance of maintaining some music to keep up the courage of those men who were being borne down by the cold weather and the pressure of the enemy, and told him to com-pose a march adapted to their peculiarly cruel condition, in which the men could be reminded of their own homes, of their own native land, and that that march should be adapted alone to the drum, because all other instruments had been stopped; and hence it is said that the celebrated march called "The Retreat from Moscow" was composed. That is said to be the history of that march.

On certain occasions, then, music may be very well; but in this case I say a band is an abuse; it is throwing away the money of the people for amusement, in addition to the salary that you pay the young men to be educated, a large portion of whom resign, and if they do not resign they ought to pay their own expenses at West Point. There is no more reason why a man should be paid to go into the Army or into the Navy than why he should be paid to go into the public service of the nation in any other capacity. The whole

Mr. ALLISON. I ask leave to modify the amendment so as to strike out the proviso only, in order to meet the suggestions made by the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from West Virginia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the Senator's proposition?
Mr. ALLISON. To strike out in line 36, all after the word "dollars," down to and including line 42, and insert what the committee have inserted The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee is to strike out and insert. That motion will have to be put. The Senator now moves to strike out a portion of the text proposed by the committee to be stricken out; that is the proviso. The question is on that amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. What will be the effect of that?
Mr. ALLISON. It simply strikes out the proviso which repeals sections 9 and 10 of the act of 1875.

Mr. DAVIS. That has already been stricken out by a vote of the Senate, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on concurring in that amendment, pending which the Senator from Iowa moves to strike out a portion of that text. The first question is on the amendment to the amendment, and then the question will recur on striking out and inserting.

Mr. STEVENSON. I will ask the Senator from Iowa what is the proviso? On what page and line is it?

Mr. ALLISON. It begins on page 2, with line 36 of the bill; it is

Mr. ALLISON. It begins on page 2, with line 36 of the bill; it is the proviso in relation to the music.

Mr. DAVIS. The effect of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa would be to provide for the sixteen musicians and strike out that part which repeals the section in relation to the band.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves to strike out the proviso in a portion of the text moved to be stricken

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I inquire of the Senator from Iowa whether, as it now stands, the bill provides for that portion of the whether, as it now stands, the bill provides for that portion of the band created last year?

Mr. ALLISON. I did not hear the Senator from Maine.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My inquiry is whether the band is now provided for, after the amendment has been acted on?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir; it is provided for.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Very well.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the oill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

DANIEL STICKNEY.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the resolution I offered yesterday.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved. That during the present session it shall be in order at any time to move a recess, and, pending an appropriation bill, to move to confine debate on amendments thereto to five minutes by any Senator on the pending motion, and such motion shall be decided without debate.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think that resolution will lead to a little debate; and I ask my colleague to indulge me in calling up a private bill that I think will not occupy three minutes.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If my colleague will allow this resolution to be taken up, I will yield with great pleasure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to taking up the resolution?

Mr. STEVENSON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Chair will put the question on taking up the resolution for consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. Now, with the consent of my colleague, I ask for the consideration of Senate bill No. 446.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the resolution will be informally postponed for that purpose.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 446) for the relief of Daniel Stickney, of Presque Isle, Maine, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $222.25 to Daniel Stickney, to re-imburse him for money-order funds stolen from his office, when he was postmaster, on the night of August 7, 1873.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think I can state the case, if any Senator wishes it, quicker than the report can be read; but if Senators are satisfied, I shall not take up time.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEBATE ON APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] is before the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Senator from Maine whether the clause as to taking a recess is intended for appropriation bills only or to apply to taking a recess is intended for appropriation bills only or to apply at any period?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will say to my friend that the resolution is simply with reference to appropriation bills. This resolution does not adopt the five-minute rule, but places the Senate in a condition where upon an appropriation bill, if it is deemed necessary, the Senate may order the five-minute rule. I think it is better to adopt it now, before we get into any debate on bills of this character. It is the usual annual resolution which we have followed for several years near. It has no amplication to anything before us at the presyears past. It has no application to anything before us at the pres-

Mr. DAVIS. I think, if my friend from Maine will read his resolution, he will find that in regard to ordering a recess it will reach all legislation, and is not confined to appropriation bills. I ask him to amend it.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not construe this resolution as the Senator from Maine does. Literally construed, the resolution makes it in order to move a recess at any time upon any bill. The resolution is:

Resolved. That during the present session it shall be in order at any time to move

That is an independent part of the sentence which does not confine it at all to the pendency of an appropriation bill. And then it goes and pending an appropriation bill to move to confine debate on amendments thereto to five minutes by any Senator on the pending motion, and such motion shall be decided without debate.

If this resolution is adopted, it will be in order to move a recess at If this resolution is adopted, it will be in order to move a recess at any time or at any moment upon any proposition. Subsequently, if an appropriation bill is under discussion, you can move to confine debate on amendments thereto to five minutes by any Senator on a pending motion, and such motions shall be decided without debate. I am opposed to the resolution on both grounds. I think this is a time when Senators should have a right to discuss appropriation bills longer than five minutes. It is a proposition to stifle debate. Appropriations of great magnitude may come before the Senate, and I hope the Senate will not stifle debate by saying that no Senator shall under priations of great magnitude may come before the Senate, and I hope the Senate will not stifle debate by saying that no Senator shall undertake to discuss an appropriation bill longer than five minutes.

As to the other part of the resolution, I do not see its object. You can move a recess now, and certainly this resolution as worded does not confine the right to move a recess to the period when appropriation bills are under discussion. The words of the resolution are—

That, during the present session, it shall be in order at any time to move a re-irrespective of what the subject-matter of discussion is. I do hope that this resolution will not be adopted.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, if the resolution is to be adopted, there is no doubt that an amendment should be made prohibiting incongruous amendments from being offered. Appropriations are the simple business bills of the body, for the appropriation of funds which have been estimated by the Departments and examined by committees; and, therefore, the subject-matter has been considered practically before it comes into the Senate. Perhaps the limitation of debate upon mere money appropriations to five minutes to each amendment by each Senator is rather business like, and not altogether unreasonable; but unquestionably, in addition to the resolution as it is now proposed, there should be a provision that amendments to an appropriation bill should be germane to the bill.

In the first place, it is a vicious method of legislation to attempt to

In the first place, it is a vicious method of legislation to attempt to ingraft general legislation upon special appropriation bills; and yet it has been done before now, and matters of very large importance have in this hasty way been ingrafted upon bills intended for nothing more than the appropriation of money for the proper expenses of the Government. I suggest, therefore, to the honorable Senator from Maine who has the resolution in charge that he should limit the amendments to matters germane to the appropriation bills. I remember very well some years ago, when a proposition of this kind was proposed, the restriction which I now suggest was added; and when we limited debate upon mere money bills, or what you may term the items of money bills, to five minutes, we provided that the amendments upon which debate was so limited should be strictly germane to the subject under consideration. I trust some one will offer such an amendment now, in order that measures of a general legislative character shall not be sprung upon the Senate in the shape of amend-ments to those bills which ought to have nothing of the kind connected with them.

The provision for a recess I do not precisely understand the necessity for. Should it so happen that an appropriation bill, which is oftentimes tedious and needs time for its consideration, should occupy too much of the day, it has been the custom of the Senate to have night sessions; and I suppose that this rule looked to such a contingency. But I do not know why a motion for a recess should not be in order without having a special rule adopted for it. I trust, however, that no amendment incongruous in its nature to an appropriation bill under consideration will be allowed to be offered. A reference to the resolution passed in the Senate before will give the phraseology of the rule that worked acceptably. I think language merely declaring that no amendment shall be in order which is not germane to the subject-matter of the bill would bring the matter within that business scope which I believe the Senator from Maine

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This resolution is introduced in the interest of the dispatch of business. The experience of the Senate for the last two or three years has rendered it necessary that some time during the session when we are pressed by appropriation bills some method of this kind should be pursued. This is a little in advance of any important necessity, I admit; but the principle, I submit, is such as the Senate will find it proper sooner or later in the session to

I will say to my honorable friend from Delaware that the especial object of putting in the clause as to a recess here is that it is accompanied with the right to move to confine debate, and the resolution provides for two motions on neither of which shall there be any debate. Without that a recess might be moved, but the motion would be open to debate. For instance, we are in the midst of an important question of any kind and the Senate have got impatient and desire to adjourn. The Senator will see that no vote could be taken under such circumstances on a motion for a night session, or an extended session, for a recess instead of an adjournment. Therefore this special resolution gives the right at any time to move a recess and declares that that question shall be taken without debate. The object is to secure the right to have a vote on taking a recess with-I will say to my honorable friend from Delaware that the especial object is to secure the right to have a vote on taking a recess without any debate, and the additional right on appropriation bills to have a five minute rule applied whenever, in the judgment of the Senate, the time has come to do it. This is a rule that the experience Senate, the time has come to do it. This is a rule that the experience of the Senate has found to be necessary at a late period of the session; and I wish to say that we are here now at the end of three months of this session and as yet, so far as this particular branch of the public service is concerned—appropriations—we have done literally next to nothing. No bill has yet been consummated, and the bills that have come to the Senate are usually those that are passed in a single hour, merely nominal. We have spent days, weeks on them. Yesterday and to-day we spent an entire legislative day on the music we should have at West Point and the only question involved in it was whether there should be a few more or a few less volved in it was whether there should be a few more or a few less musicians, and the money we spent in examining that question would probably pay the $14,000 appropriated for the band several times over. On the supposition that we are to continue this session as we have begun, we shall be next year here appropriating for the current fiscal year; we shall be in the condition of the old gentleman at one of the Departments who was put upon the business of counting dilapidated fractional currency and was not willing to take the amount of money counted for his wages. There is no end unless some such policy as this is adopted by which those having the control of the appropriation committees can bring the Senate to a vote. There is no such thing as ending this session within any reasonable time as matters now are. volved in it was whether there should be a few more or a few less matters now are.

Of course, Mr. President, I have no anxiety on this subject. I feel it my duty to present it to the Senate. If the resolution is acceptable, very well; otherwise, it is just as well so far as I am personally concerned.

I move to amend the resolution in the last line by adding the letter "s" to "motion," so as to read:

And such motions shall be decided without debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to that modification? The Chair hears none, and the modification will be made.

Mr. BAYARD. I move to amend the resolution by adding to it:

nendment to an appropriation bill shall be in order which is not german

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think that would destroy the efficiency of the rule entirely. Almost all the amendments which would be proposed to an appropriation are of that character; and, if the rule only applies to such amendments as are germane to the bill, the whole utility of the rule I should consider lost.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If we could have an effectual rule that should provide, as to House bills as well as our own amendments, that everything in them should be struck out which was of a legislative character other than the mere appropriation of money to carry out existing laws, we should make a good step in the right direction. But the difficulty which we labor under here is that every session, this and all former ones, the appropriation bills of the House come over here with provisions in them of a legislative character, not merely providing money out of the Treasury to do what the law already enjoins, but to do something else, to change the body of the laws in connection with the appropriation of the money to carry them out, which is a very bad principle, and one which if we had refused to act upon for years past, as we must do at last, we should have saved the Government a great deal of money and the law a great deal of confusion.

Now, if the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Rules can contrive some means by which when an appropriation bill comes here from the House of Representatives everything in it shall be struck out other than the mere appropriation of money to carry out existing laws, no matter if it is only half the money the law requires; that any change in the body of the law shall be struck out once and forever; then we shall have done the country a great deal of service. But I do not know that there is any hope of that. Certainly this amendment of the Senator from Delaware looks in the other direction; for as the Senator from Maine has said the question. other direction; for, as the Senator from Maine has said, the question other direction; for, as the Senator from Maine has said, the question of whether a matter is germane to the bill is rather indefinable. You can make almost everything germane. If a bill provides for the payment of the salary of the President of the United States, you can say in mere philosophic sense that it is perfectly germane to provide that hereafter it shall be $100,000 a year, or that hereafter it shall be $10,000 a year, and so of every one of the appropriations that are made to carry out the existing law and to carry on the operations of the Government. You can add to each sum of money for each particular item a provision on the general subject of the dyties of the officer and the a provision on the general subject of the duties of the officer and the structure of the department under which he acts, and, in fact, you can draw in the whole body of the laws. That is not what we desire to do; we desire to do exactly the reverse; and therefore to provide, as this amendment does by implication, that while nothing not germane shall be offered, everthing that is germane may be offered, is to open the door wide. Hence it goes, as it appears to me, in the wrong direction. We have a standing rule of the Senate which is a great deal better than the amendment offered by the Senator from Dela-

Mr. DAVIS. I want to appeal to my friend from Maine whether the resolution had not better go to the Committee on Rules. It is early in the session, much earlier probably than we have ever adopted such a rule. I shall be in favor of it when there is a necessity for it; but, as I understand the resolution, it will allow us to move for a recess at any time, no matter whether an appropriation bill is under discussion or not. It is known further that at this time there is no appropriation bill ready for action by the Senate. I would ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if it would not be satisfactory to him to let the resolution go to the Committee on Rules! It will only take a short time for them to report it back.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In regard to the question of time, we have adopted this rule at a much earlier period of the session heretofore. We have adopted it sometimes in January.

fore. We have adopted it sometimes in January.

Mr. DAVIS. Was not that during the short session?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, during the short session. Fadmit that there is less necessity for the adoption of it at an early period now than heretofore. But this is not a question to be sent to the Committee on Rules at all. If there is anything well settled, it is that the Senate has found it necessary to adopt such a rule as this. Unless my friend has it in his mind that it is desirable to add something to this work a precision for instance, as the Senator from Vermont has rule, such a provision, for instance, as the Senator from Vermont has suggested, I can see no necessity for sending it to the Committee on

I feel no especial urgency about this. It is the usual method pursued. If the Senate is not ready to act upon it, very well. If it is, I should like to have it disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment roposed by the Senator from Delaware.

The question being put; there were upon division—ayes 18, noes 17.
Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.
Mr. BAYARD. I am surprised that there should be any objection to so reasonable a proposition as this. I can understand that in de-bate on money bills, five minutes on each amendment, where the sub-ject has before that time been scrutinized first by the Department and then submitted to a committee and by the committee to the body, may be sufficient. There can be no difficulty where a Senator desires to discuss a subject, to offer further amendments, or have permission to continue his remarks. But, as I said when I rose to propose this amendment, it is a vicious kind of legislation to ingraft general legislation on specific measures of appropriation for a certain purpose.

The rule of the Senate has been, and I trust always will continue, that they shall be limited only by the discretion of the speakers. These being however mere business bills, I can recognize the efficiency of the proposed rule for the expedition of business; but I submit that it would be only just, where you depart from the usage of the Senate and arbitrarily fix five minutes as the limitation of debate, that you should couple it with the understanding that the amendment offered should be germane to the bill.

If it were not confined to mere money bills, mere business measures, I cannot believe the Senate would agree to have any limitation of debate fixed upon it; but as these are mere business bills involving items of Government expenditure, it seems to me eminently proper that no other items of a different character and no provisions of a different nature of a general legislative character should be in order when offered as amendments. I remember very well that when this limitation of five minutes was offered some years ago and adopted by the Senate it was coupled with a proposition similar in character to that which I now propose. I remember it very well, because we of the minority considered that there had been a violation of the lan-guage of the rule by the admission by the presiding officer of the Senate of an amendment which was not germane to the bill. It led to a long and exciting discussion that lasted an entire night. It was owing to the belief that the rule of the Senate had been violated by the ruling of the Chair. My recollection is very distinct. I see no reason why the same accompanying proposition to limit the subject-matter of amendments, that they shall be germane to the general subject of the bill, should not be made part of this restrictive rule on debate that the Senate for the dispatch of business propose now to adopt. I cannot understand any reasonable objection to the proposition I offer, and I trust the Senate will agree with me on that subject.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I am in favor of a resolution like this in reference to appropriation bills. On bills appropriating money this in reference to appropriation bills. On bills appropriating money for specific objects, I think a debate of five minutes each will enable us to do business in a business-like way; but should there be amendments entertained not germane to the appropriation of money, it might be a question that we ought to be heard upon for a longer period. I will take a recent illustration. Look at section 4 of one of the general appropriation bills of 1873. That section, being the last one, provides for bringing suits; provides for enforcing decrees; provides that a certain railroad company shall not be subject to the bankrupt laws; provides that the United States courts may enforce writs of mandamus, provides that the United States courts may enforce writs of mandamus. provides that the United States courts may enforce writs of mandamus in a certain way. If such an amendment as that comes up and is entertained, it seems to me the Senate would not attempt to say that there should not be a debate upon it longer than five minutes; and as that has been the practice, till we can get a joint rule or some rule to prevent it, I think there should be no difficulty in saying that this limitation of five minutes shall not apply if there is under consideration some subject not germane to an appropriation bill. hope the original resolution will be adopted; and I think we should add to it this limitation to guard against being cut off by a technical rule from discussing some matter that is under consideration that requires a longer discussion than five minutes.

I shall vote for the original resolution anyhow; but I hope we shall put on this proviso, that if there is under consideration something that has really nothing to do with the appropriation bill before the Senate, it may be debated longer.

Mr. DAVIS. Is it in order to move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is in order.
Mr. DAVIS. I make that motion.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia moves to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SARGENT. I shall vote against this amendment, not because I am desirons that amendments not germane to appropriation bills shall be added to them, but because I think the thirtieth rule of the Senate is more stringent than this rule would be with the amendment added to it. That excludes certain classes of legislation which it Says shall not go on appropriation bills. I want to hold to that rule. I fear that this weakens it, and therefore I shall vote against it.

Mr. COCKRELL. May I ask the Senator what rule it is ?

Mr. SARGENT. Rule 30, which is as follows:

Mr. Sarkeent. Rule 30, which is as follows:

No amendment proposing additional appropriations shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session, or moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or in pursuance of an estimate from the head of some of the Departments; and no amendment shall be received whose object is to provide for a private claim, unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation.

All amendments to general appropriation bills reported from committees of the Senate, proposing new items of appropriation, shall one day before they are offered be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and all general appropriation bills shall be referred to the said committee; and in like manner, notice of amendments to bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors shall be given and referred to the committee to which such bills shall be referred.

Any pending amendment to a general appropriation bill may be laid on the table without affecting the bill.

I wish to preserve that rule in its integrity and I fear this average.

I wish to preserve that rule in its integrity and I fear this amendment weakens it, and for that reason I shall vote against it.

Mr. BAYARD. All of the excluded amendments to general appro-printion bills referred to in this rule are stated in the alternative, printion bills referred to in this rule are stated in the alternative, and they are all very well; but they do not cover the difficulty which my amendment is meant to relieve against. Under the rules, as they stand now, unlimited debate is allowed upon all matters. Some amendments are there excluded. That is all very well; but there is no reason why an incongruous amendment, even from a committee or a Department, should be placed on an appropriation bill. The instance just cited by the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. Kernan] is forcibly in point. Upon an appropriation bill a matter entirely inconsistent with the object of the bill, a matter of general and important legislation, was ingrafted, and under this rule could be ingrafted without the opportunity of discussion. I very well remember that it was upon the Army appropriation bill, in 1872, that it was proposed as an amendment to give power to the President of the United States to suspend the writ of habeas corpus in any part of the Union, if he saw fit, for another year. It was that illustration of the danger of such multifarious legislation, and not only multifarious, which in itself is a vice, but legislation to be adopted under this present rule without an opportunity of full debate.

This five-minute rule need not be in operation except upon motion This nive-minute rule need not be in operation except upon motion on some particular bill. It may be that an appropriation bill of a very enlarged character can pass this House, as I have seen it pass, arrested but little by debate or by comment upon its provisions; and in such a case as that there would be no necessity for a motion to adopt this five-minute rule. It is only when a bill drags, it is only when the temper of the Senate and the subject-matter threaten to prolong the consideration of it beyond what is reasonable and business-like, that the Senator in charge of the bill has the right to move the imposition of this five-minute limitation on debate. When that the imposition of this five-minute limitation on debate. When that is to be done, then it is time that we should strictly insist that measures not germane to the subject of the bill should not be sprung upon the Senate during that period of limitation on debate. That is all. The other rule that has been referred to by the Senator from California would remain in force, whether the limitation upon debate had been ordered under this rule or not. It is only upon the occasion of the imposition of a limitation on debate that I would suggest that the measures proposed should be of the nature of the bill itself, and not be incongruous or in the nature of general legislation.

I remember once when the law repealing the exclusion of witness on the ground of interest in the courts of justice was adopted by the Senate and by Congress, it was found not in a bill by itself, but found as an amendment to some appropriation bill; and any man who had occasion to find out the law, to learn its letter and its scope, was compelled to look almost as for a needle in a hay-stack to find it in the statutes of the United States. An exceedingly important provision, making all persons, parties or otherwise, competent witnesses in the courts of the United States, notwithstanding their interest, was put on as an amendment to an appropriation bill and possibly decided in a debate limited to five minutes. I mention that as an illustration of how interests may be amendments and how when they are in how incongruous may be amendments, and how, when they are in-congruous, they should not be subjected at least to this limitation of five minutes.

It is true that under our rules it is in order to lay an amendment to an appropriation bill on the table, which motion prevailing carries to the table the amendment and does not disturb the bill. Nevertheless I think it is eminently in favor of a proper class of legislation that incongruous measures should not be blended in the same act; and that is made more necessary when the general rules of the Senate in regard to unlimited debate shall be set aside for a mere business purpose.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I think that legislation upon an appropriation bill is manifestly improper and is an evil which has appropriation bill is manifestly improper and is an evil which has grown to very great proportions within a few years, and I should cheerfully vote for a joint rule prohibiting legislation upon any appropriation bill and confining the appropriation bills to carrying out existing laws, appropriating the necessary money for the purposes already provided for by statute. But it would be manifestly placing ourselves in a false position if we should allow the House of Representatives to send us appropriation bills with legislation upon them without our having the privilege of rejecting or altering their legislation or proposing something in its stead. It would bring us here merely to record their edicts or to deny them, while we had no such privilege ourselves.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays 28; as follows:

28; as follows:
YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Cockrell. Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Mcrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—25.
NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Harvey, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Sargent, Spencer, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—28.
ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Booth, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Caperton, Christiancy, Clayton, Conover, Dawes, English, Gordon, Hamlin, Howe, Patterson, Randolph, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sharon, and Sherman—20.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the resolution. The resolution was agreed to.

CENTRAL BRANCH UNION PACIFIC ROAD.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 60. I do not ask for action this afternoon, but I call it up so

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 60) declaring the true intent and meaning of the Union Pacific Railroad acts approved July 1, 1862, July 2, 1864, and July 3, 1866, and for other purposes.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no wish to proceed with the bill to-day. call it up now for this reason: The Senator from Kansas [Mr. IN-GALLS] said that when the bill should be called up he would be very glad that I would bring it to the attention of the Senate the day before, so that if he desired to address himself to the bill he might do so. I am quite willing to give way for a motion to adjourn or for an executive session; but before doing so I wish to say that a report was made on this bill at the last session of Congress which discussed the made on this bill at the last session of Congress which discussed the entire question. I have no disposition to discuss it, and do not expect to discuss it. I would be very glad if Senators would take up that report and examine it, if possible, before to-morrow, so that we may dispose of the question with as little delay as possible.

Mr. INGALLS. If I remember correctly, the report to which the Senator from Iowa alludes embraces about difty-eight printed pages. The Senate will therefore see that the subject is one of considerable importance, and that it will require probably a large amount of discussion and debate. I venture to express the hope also that if this subject is taken up it may be with the understanding that there is to be a full consideration of it upon an understanding of the questions involved.

be a full consideration of it apos as a successful involved.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have not any expectation that the Senate will dispose of it otherwise than after the very fullest consideration. I only referred to the report that was made by the committee for the reason that it goes into the subject very fully; and I am very sure if Senators can have time to examine the report they will understand the entire question much better than they can from any debate that they take place here. I have no desire, however, to limit the debate may take place here. I have no desire, however, to limit the debate on the bill in any way whatever.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa whether the purpose of this bill is not to negative a conclusion which the Government heretofore has maintained; that is to say, whether it is not to assert, by excluding a negative, that certain privileges were granted to a company by the Government; that a land grant which the Government up to this time has denied that its legislation gave to the company it will receive? The soil stating that it shall not have beyond a certain point, is it not in effect a grant up to that point, and

Mr. WRIGHT. I am not certain that the Senator understands the purport of the bill which relates to the Central Branch of the Union purport of the bill which relates to the Central Branch of the Child Pacific Railroad. The bill is in entire accord and harmony with the decisions of all departments of the Government up to about the time that a resolution was introduced by the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] which was the foundation for this bill.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minntes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at three o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, February 29, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTION OF THE RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I rise to a question of privilege. I am reported in the RECORD of to-day as having introduced a bill yesterday and made a motion to refer it to the Committee of the Whole House, which was decided against me by the Chair; and here is the remark I am reported as having made:

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I do not ask that the bill shall be made a special order at all. The motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole has preference over all other committees, as the Chair will see if he will look at Rule 59.

What I said was to page 69 of the Digest and also to page 170 of the Rules of the House. I now ask the attention of the Chair and I will read the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say to the gentleman that it is very clear that the correction should be made in the RECORD as he desires, and unless he desires a further hearing it will be so ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I merely want to read the rule as the reason why I made the motion:

The rules and practice of the House recognize two Committees of the Whole, namely, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to which are referred public bills and public business, and the Committee of the Whole House, to which are referred private bills and private business.

"When a resolution shall be offered, or a motion made to refer any subject, and different committees shall be proposed, the question shall be taken in the following order: The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; the Committee of the Whole House; a standing committee; a select committee."

I therefore made a motion that the bill should be referred to the committee first in order, and I was overruled.

RED CLOUD AGENCY IN NEBRASKA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 28, 1876.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I lay before you herewith a communication from the Secretary of the Interior of date of the 26th instant, upon the subject of the deficiency of supplies at the Red Cloud agency, Nebraska. This matter has already been presented to you by the Secretary, and the House of Representatives has requested investigation by a military officer of the causes of this deficiency. I have taken the proper steps to comply with this request of the House, but the present need of supplies is not disputed. A prolonged delay in furnishing provisions to these Indians will cause great distress and be likely to provoke raids on the white settlements and probably lead to general outbreak and hostilities. I therefore deem it proper to invite your attention to early and favorable action upon the estimates heretofore and herewith submitted. These estimates and the views of the Secretary in regard to this emergency meet with my full concurrence, and I recommend that the appropriation asked for may be made at the earliest day possible.

U. S. GRANT.

Mr. RANDALL. It is proper that I should say that the Committee on Appropriations considered this subject and were not able to get that information which they deemed essential, and therefore they made a report to the House recommending that the President of the United States should appoint an officer to go to the Red Cloud agency with a view of learning the facts. Now this communication would seem to imply that the President desires an appropriation for this deficiency prior to the report of that Army officer. I do not know what the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations would be in that connection; but unless that report is to be postponed for an unreasonable length of time, I think we should await its reception. There have been gross frauds perpetrated in connection with this agency. Last year we made a sufficient appropriation to cover all the expenses of the agency. In addition, there has been a disregard of law. But, as the President of the United States seems to consider it of sufficient importance to send a communication to the House upon the subject, of course the Committee on Appropriations will at once proceed to consider it

Mr. ATKINS. Has the officer been appointed by the President for this purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. The President so states in his communication. I move that the message of the President, with the accompanying documents, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed. The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN DEPREDATIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House sundry communications from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the provisions of the act of May 29, 1872, the claims of many persons for indemnity for depredations committed by sundry bands of Indians; which were referred to the Committee of Claims.

SIOUX INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an estimate for an appropriation of $25,000 to pay the Sioux Indians for relinquishing the right to hunt in certain territory; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ALASKA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the copy of a brief on the subject of the furisdiction of the War Department over the Territory of Alaska; which was referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed.

H. E. EBSTEIN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, calling attention to his letter of the 4th of December, 1874, recommending the passage of a bill for the relief of Lieutenant H. E. Ebstein, Twenty-first Infantry; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LEAVENWORTH STREET RAILROAD COMPANY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in connection with his letter of February 16, the reports of Generals Pope and Sherman on the bill to grant the right of way to the Leavenworth Street Railroad Company across the Fort Leavenworth military reservation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WILLIAM P. ROSS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General, transmitting, in response to a House resolution of the 15th instant, papers and records relating to the complicity of William P. Ross in the alleged Indian-bounty frauds of John W. Wright; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RADDY M'CONNELL.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2424) granting a pension to Raddy McConnell, of Meigs County, Ohio, a soldier of the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. CAMELIA DANIELS.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2425) granting a pension to Mrs. Camelia Daniels, of Scioto County, Ohio, mother of James Steele Daniels, deceased, late a private, Company B, Twenty-second Ohio Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MRS - DORIAS.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2426) granting a pension to Mrs. — Dorias, of Lawrence County, Ohio, mother of August Dorias, deceased, late a private of Battery L, First Ohio Light Artillery; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to this House copies of the late reports of the Assistant Adjutant-General James M. Vincent in regard to freedmen's affairs.

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for consideration at this time the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk. Mr. KASSON. I will not object to the introduction of the joint resolution for reference.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman will hear me for one moment I think he will not object to considering and passing the joint resolu-

A similar joint resolution was passed by the House on the 22d of last February, providing for the restoration of the signatures of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, which, either by the influence of time or the application of some chemical in taking a copy, have been almost effaced. The resolution provides that the Secretary of the Interior, the secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, and the Librarian of Congress shall be a commission to have the signatures restored, at the expense of the contingent fund of the Interior De-

Mr. KASSON. If that is all, there is no objection to it.
Mr. KELLEY. A resolution of this kind passed the last House on the 22d of February, went to the Senate on the 23d, and was lost sight of in the haste incident to the closing of the session. There can be

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that a commission, consisting of the Secretary of the Interior, the secretary of the Smithsisting of the Secretary of the Interior, the secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, and the Librarian of Congress, be empowered to have resort to such means as will most effectually restore the writing of the original manuscript of the Declaration of Independence, with the signatures appended thereto, now in the United States Patent-Office, and that the expense attending the same be defrayed out of the contingent fund of the Interior Department.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 77) providing for the restoration of the original Declaration of Independence, was introduced, read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KELLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TIMBER CULTURE.

Mr. SAYLER, by unanimous consent, reported, from the Committee on Public Lands, a substitute (H. R. No. 2427) for House bill No. 625, a bill to amend the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to encourage the growth of timber on the western prairies,' approved March 13, 1874, and, for Hsuse bill No. 643, a bill explanatory of the timber-culture act; which were read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

LAND ENTRIES WITHIN RAILROAD GRANTS.

Mr. SAYLER. I am also directed by the Committee on Public Lands to ask that the House order the printing of the communication of the Jommissioner of the General Land Office in relation to House bill N . 120 and Senate bill No. 34, with reference to confirming entries of public lands within the limits of railroad grants. It is a very important communication containing all the facts with reference to those grants.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the printing will be ordered.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ESTIMATES OF NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report back, with amendments, a bill (H. R. No. 1344) directing the method of annual estimates of expenditures to be submitted from the Navy Department; and to ask unanimous consent that the bill, as amended, be ordered to be printed and made a special order for Thursday next after the morning hour.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. There is a special order set down for Thursday—the Hawaiian treaty.

Mr. RANDALL. Why could we not take up this bill after the morning hour to-day?

The question being put on the motion to make the bill a special order for Thursday next, it was not agreed to.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I move then that the bill be ordered to be printed and recommitted.

Mr. HALE. Not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider. The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I move that the various votes this morning by which bills, &c., have been recommitted and referred be reconsidered, and that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table. Several members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to ask if it is the pleasure of the House that certain bills upon the Speaker's table shall now be appropriately referred.

There was no objection.

REFUNDING THE NATIONAL DEBT.

The bill (S. No. 478) amendatory of an act entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, and of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt,'" approved January 20, 1871, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

B. P. PATTERSON.

The bill (S. No. 140) for the relief of B. P. Patterson was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

G. B. TYLER AND E. H. LUCKETT.

The bill (S. No. 489) for the relief of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at two minutes before one o'clock. The regular order is the call of committees for reports of a public nature; and the call rests with the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS, MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE.

Mr. YOUNG. I call for the consideration of the unfinished busi-

Mr. YOUNG. I call for the consideration of the unfinished business of the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business coming over from the morning hour of Thursday last is a bill (H. R. No. 2226) to further provide for the building of a custom-house, post-office, court-room, &c., in the city of Memphis, reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. YOUNG.] The previous question had been seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the pending amendments had been disposed of. The question now recurs on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BEEBE. 1 demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

bill.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I merely wish to state that this bill does not make an appropriation of money out of the Treasury, but simply prescribes a limitation upon the cost of this public building for various governmental purposes in the city of Memphis. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. BEEBE. Mr. Speaker, is it in order now to move the recommittal of this bill to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BEEBE. Then I make that motion, and for this reason: I find upon investigation of this matter that this bill calls for the appropriation of $400,000 as at present amended for the purpose of erecting a custom-house, court-house, &c., where the customs revenues amount to but $33,000 a year and the expense of collecting that $33,000 amounts to about $10,000, making the net revenue to the Government something like $20,000. As I understand it, the erection of this building has not yet begun.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I understand that the bill comes over from the last morning hour under the operation of the previous ques-

The SPEAKER. The bill did come over from the last morning hour under the operation of the previous question, but the bill this morning has been ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, which exhausted the previous question. The question then recurred on the passage of the bill, when the gentleman from New York [Mr. Beebe] passage of the bill, when the gentleman from New York [211, DEEDS] moved its recommittal.

Mr. BEEBE. As I understand it, the previous question was demanded on the amendments then pending, which, upon consultation with old members of the House, goes merely to that amendment, and not to the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The previous question exhausted itself on the third reading of the engrossed bill and is not now pending, not having third reading of the engrossed bill and is not now pending, not having been called on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BEEBE. I will now resume the floor, and propose only to occupy the attention of the House for a little while.

As I have already stated, Mr. Speaker, the net revenue accruing to the Government at this point was something like $20,000 a year. It is now proposed to erect a building which is to cost $400,000. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Kelley,] when the bill was under consideration on a previous occasion, stated that it was in his view the better policy to erect these costly and magnificent structures because they were to least for all time, and he took occasion at the because they were to last for all time, and he took occasion at the same time to assure this House of the deep interest he felt in the welfare of the working classes. Now, sir, I appeal to him and to every gentleman on this floor who is really, sincerely, earnestly, and honestly in sympathy with the sentiment which prevailed at the popular elections which made this House politically what it is to-day, I appeal to all such to unite with me, and upon this the first occasion when a proposition comes before the House to commence the erection of a building to cost this enormous sum of money out of the Treasury of the United States, to repudiate it; and then, when we shall have defeated this measure, when we shall have broken whatever combination may exist here, we may hope to be able to beat similar measures as they are brought forward.

If I understand, Mr. Speaker, the sentiment of the people at this time, in view of the stringency in business matters throughout the land, it is opposed to the commencement of any new public works not absolutely indispensable. Why, sir, the Secretary of the Treasury in his budget asks for but $100,000. Here we have a Secretary in sympathy with a party and Administration which we on this side of the House have denounced as corrupt in many of its features, and extravagant in all, asking for but $100,000; and yet this House pro-

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?
Mr. BEEBE. Yes, sir.
Mr. HOLMAN. My friend from New York misapprehends this bill.
In 1873 $5,000 was appropriated to begin the construction of this building at Memphis, Tennessee, but it imposed no limit upon the cost of the building. The Secretary of the Treasury declined to proceed with the building of the custom-house, on the ground that no limit had been imposed on the cost, making however an estimate for the present current year of $100,000.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds reported this bill for two purposes. The city of Memphis had proposed to make a donation to the Government of a piece of ground, said to be quite valuable, on which the building should be erected. Congress had directed the sale of the present site by the same act of 1873 which made the appropriation of $75,000. The committee desired to accomplish two purposes. Inasmuch as a limitation was necessary to the cost of the building, and the city of Memphis had donated the ground on the condition that the Government would commence the building in the condition that the Government would commence the building in the month of May next—that is the language of the donation—the committee desired to fix first what might be the ultimate cost of the building, and they proposed as the limit $600,000. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Supervising Architect of the Treasury had recommended that the limit be $800,000. The committee fixed upon $600,000. On my motion the House further amended the bill so as to reduce the amount to $400,000 as the limit of the cost. But the bill does not propose to appropriate the $100,000 asked for by the Secretary of the Treasury. On the contrary, I can assure my friend from New York [Mr. Beebe] that so far as I am informed that $100,000 will not be appropriated for this present current year as asked for by the Treasury Department.

What is proposed to be done by this bill is to fix the limit of the entire cost of the building when it shall be erected, and at the same time to provide that the Government shall take the necessary steps to obtain the benefit of this donation of land for a site. And I will say to my friend that the main controlling reason which induced the report of this bill was that the Government might obtain the benefit of this donation of site of land for a building that the forest bild was that the Government might obtain the benefit of this donation of site of land form building the form the land for the of this donation of a site of land for a building. And, further, by the second section the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to sell the present site, and to cover into the Treasury the proceeds arising

My friend from New York, therefore, will see from this explanation what is the exact object of the bill. It does not appropriate any money. It limits the cost of the building to $400,000, while the Sec-money. It limits the cost of the building to $400,000, while the Secretary of the Treasury and the Supervising Architect recommended the limit to be $800,000. It makes no appropriation whatever, but simply seeks to obtain the benefit of this donation; nothing more. If my friend's understanding of the object of the bill was correct, that the Treasury Department asked $100,000, and that we propose to appropriate $400,000, it would certainly be a case that might well excite great astonishment. But, so far from that being the case, we do not appropriate a dollar. Neither by the vote in this House nor by the report of the committee is one dollar sought to be appropriate. by the report of the committee is one dollar sought to be appropriated for this purpose for the current year. We have thought, however, that it would be well for the Government to obtain the benefit of this donation; for my friend must see that sooner or later, if not now, yet in the future, and perhaps in the early future, it will be proper enough to erect a public building at the city of Memphis, not only on account of its having been deemed suitable to be a port of entry, but also because it is a place where the Federal courts are held, and where post-office accommodation is wanted, and where the Government is now paying a very large sum of money for rent.

I agree with the gentleman from New York in all that he said in opposition to lavish expenditures for public buildings, and I am perfectly willing that after hearing this statement the House shall take any course it deems proper. But if we are to take advantage of this donation of the land from the city of Memphis, a bill of this character ought to be passed.

Mr. BEEBE. Mr. Speaker, I did not misunderstand this matter. I am very grateful to the gentleman from Indiana for his explanation, but it does not change my view of this subject one particle. By the gentleman's own admission, by the explanation which he has so gengentleman's own admission, by the explanation which he has so generously and at such extended length given to this House, we find that legislation is necessary to secure the commencement of this building and the expenditure of this money. I am opposed to this proposition, and it is the proposition which I arose to oppose.

Sir, I am opposed to the erection of any building at Memphis, now or at any time, until it shall be shown that the public necessities demand the expenditure, and when the necessity arises it will be time to meet it. Why, sir, I find in looking over the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury that $28,000,000 are asked for public works for the next fiscal year against $16,000,000 appropriated by what we on this side of the House denounced as an extravagant Congress last year. Sixteen million dollars were appropriated then, $28,000,000 are called for now. And I will take occasion to say right here and now, that I believe if gentlemen will stop this unseemly wrangling about abstruse propositions of finance and approach the settlement of our difficulties in the only sensible and reasonable way, to wit, the bringing of the expenditures of the Government within the proceeds le-gitimately derived from the taxation of the Government, we will have done more and better than we can do in any other way. sir, for one, I shall be found voting against any appropriation in the State of New York or out of it, unless I am thoroughly persuaded that an absolute and immediate necessity demands the appropriation. It will not do for gentlemen to say that the city of New York has had its millions for public buildings. Ah, gentlemen, when the city of New York makes any such demand as this, I shall regret it more of New York makes any such demand as this, I shall regret it more than any one of you if you do not deny its demand. The city of New York I know has its costly structures, but she collects revenue there to the amount of $108,000,000, while $33,000 only are collected at Memphis. Erect a building on the same scale at New York—one proportioned to the amount of revenue derived—on the same scale as proposed for this at Memphis, and you will have a structure costing some thousands of millions of dollars.

Now, sir, I desire to meet this proposition right here and now. If there remains one dollar in the Treasury of the United States as to which additional legislation must be had before any expenditure can be made of it, then I say, let not that legislation be had, unless it is absolutely necessary, unless some public exigency demands it. I have no ill-feeling toward the city of Memphis, nor any other section of the country. I regard it all as one common country, but I believe it to be the duty of every Representative here to put forth the most earnest efforts to keep the expenditures within the most reasonable bounds, at least until business shall have revived and the country shall look out on a prospect which promises more and better for its welfare than anything which comes within the range of my vision welfare than anything which comes within the range of my vision now; and if it be in order I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to recommit, because I want a record on this proposition.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think the gentleman from New York is entirely mistaken with regard to the provisions of this bill. Its purpose is simply to limit the Treasury Department in making plans of this court-house below $400,000 and to authorize the sale of a lot now held by the Government in the city of Memphis, and to accept the donation of another lot by the city council of that city. That is everything there is in the bill. When the question comes up of appropriating money to build a custom-house in the city of Memphis, propriating money to build a custom-house in the city of Memphis, the argument of the gentleman from New York would be in order; now it does not apply. I can see nothing objectionable in the immediate passage of the bill; it is certainly a limitation upon the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States and the Supervising Architect of the Treasury.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Springer] give me some information? I could not hear the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; his remarks were addressed the other way and I am therefore left without the information.

dressed the other way, and I am therefore left without the information the gave? I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to state that the only object of this bill is to put a limitation on the appropriation and also to dispose of a piece of public land owned in the city of Memphis by the Government.

Mr. SPRINGER. And to accept a lot from the city of Memphis.

Mr. KASSON. The point that I think I have not heard any one state occurred to me in reading the bill, if I am not misinformed—and have not read the bill for several days—and it is this that in con-I have not read the bill for several days-and it is this, that in connection with the acceptance of a lot from the city of Memphis the United States binds itself, making a contract with that city, to erect this building thereon for certain purposes. If I am not mistaken that provision is put in the clause of the bill which accepts the grant of the property to the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me a word,

Mr. KASSON. Now that the gentleman from Indiana is on his feet, let me ask him do I suppose rightly that he is advocating an appropriation while the gentleman from New York [Mr. Beebe] is opposing it? I never knew such a thing happen before, and I can

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman makes a very good point, and I am glad to see him smile. My friends from New York and Iowa will observe the simple facts as to this matter of a contract. The donation of a site was made, as I have stated, on the condition, in view of the of a site was made, as I have stated, on the condition, in view of the legislation of Congress of 1875 providing for this building and appropriating $75,000 for that purpose—which is still unexpended, and has not been covered into the Treasury—that this appropriation should be effectual and the title vested in the United States, provided the Government commenced the erection of the building by the month of May, 1876. The language of this bill is, on the advice of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, that the Secretary of the Treasury take such steps as may be necessary to secure that domation which was made on condition that the work should be commenced by the month of May, 1876, and the purpose work should be commenced by the month of May, 1876, and the purpose of the bill is that the Secretary of the Treasury shall take the necessary steps to obtain the benefit of that donation.

Mr. KASSON. Am I right then in saying that by that clause of the bill the United States makes a contract with the city of Memphis to construct this building?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think my friend from Iowa can call it a

Mr. KASSON. I think there is no doubt of it.
Mr. HOLMAN. The donation was made on the condition that the Secretary of the Treasury should take the necessary steps to secure the benefit of the donation. If the Government does not think proper to begin the construction within the time specified, then as a matter of course the donation lapses; otherwise it becomes effective.

Mr. BEEBE. Is not additional legislation necessary to make the appropriation available?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think so.
Mr. BEEBE. If we have a right to reduce the amount from $600,000 to $400,000, is not it much better that we should cut it off altogether? Mr. HOLMAN. I say not asking any appropriation at all or insisting on the construction of the building. My own opinion is that it is well that the Government should avail itself of this donation, but I do not think that we should at the outset make a large appropriation for the building; I think the business of constructing buildings ought to be very slow, and I am very much obliged to the gentleman from New York for the earnest protest he has entered against the expenditure of large sums of money in the erection of public buildings; I am obliged to him for th.

I am obliged to him for it.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say only a few words in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Bezer.] If, sir, he had exercised the same industry in searching for all the facts which might very properly enter into this discussion as he has in gathering the those which relate alone to the poverty of Memphis, and the small amount of customs dues collected at that port, he would, I think, have discovered many other facts which might in all probability have influenced both his vote and his speech upon this measure. He might have discovered, as I have done since I have had this bill in hand, that the antire State of Tampesses has only received from the General have discovered, as I have dote since I have had this bill in hand, that the entire State of Tennessee has only received from the General Government since 1789 up to 1873, for the purpose of improving rivers and harbors, constructing reads, and erecting public buildings, $451,826.29, while, during the same period and for the same purpose, the gentleman's own State of New York has succeeded in obtaining from the Federal Treasury the sum of $15,691,722.32; and since the date of the report from which I take the figures, namely, January 7, 1874, additional appropriations have swelled the amount to nearly twenty millions. The figures show something of a contrast in the benefits received by my own and the gentleman's State from the bounty of the General Government. Greater research might also have dischosed to the gentleman the fact that in two years alone, in the midst of all the calamities brought upon her by the war, Memphis paid into the Federal Treasury $21,000,000. Now is it too much to ask that $400,000 of this shall be expended in her midst, upon a work from which the General Government would receive the larger share of advantage; but even this sum is not asked as a present apshare of advantage; but even this sum is not asked as a present ap-

It is only sought by this bill to secure the benefit of past legislation, both to the city and to the Government. And when even this little is asked, to my surprise and astonishment I find myself confronted by the opposition of the gentleman who comes from a State that has been so generously provided for at the public expense. And I respectfully submit that it is not a very graceful or generous thing to deny to us who have not been so fortunate the little which is sought to be obtained by this bill. I ask the gentleman if he has not sought to be obtained by this bill. I ask the gentleman if he has not commenced inculcating the lessons of economy at rather a late period? This is all I have to say. I feel that I can with confidence appeal to the justice and generosity of this House, to both democrats and republicans, to deal fairly and justly with the city and section I have the honor to represent upon this floor.

Mr. BEEBE. If this question is put upon the ground of generosity and charity there are many other cities that might be as much entitled to it as Memphis.

Mr. YOUNG. Memphis desires no charity, nor am I asking for any, but only for justice and a respect for former laws.

but only for justice and a respect for former laws.

Mr. BEEBE. All I desire to add is that if this is a matter of charity or generosity, then, if we have the right to consider that, I am perhaps inclined to be as generous toward the gentleman as he would wish.

The question was on the motion to recommit.

Mr. BEEBE. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays. The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon division there were—ayes 28, noes 107.

RESTORATION OF PENSIONERS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Mr. HUNTON. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. HUNTON. Then I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of proceeding with the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1605) amending the laws granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and their widows.

The motion was agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, (Mr. Blackburn in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1605) amending the laws granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and their widows. such of said soldiers as are now deceased. I am, therefore, in favor of the provisions of this bill in so far as they propose to accomplish this object by extending the right to a pension to all of such soldiers

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I approve the general policy of granting pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812 and to the widows of who served for the period of five days in that war and to their widows, where they were married prior to 1850. I would be willing to go ows, where they were married prior to 1830. I would be willing to go even further than this, and give a pension to every soldier of that war, without regard to his time of service.

But while this is true, I am opposed to the fifth section of the bill as it now stands, and I shall vote for the amendment to it offered by as it how stands, and I shall vote for the amendment to it offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. Caswell.] When we give to those interested in this section a full pension of $8 per month for and during the term of their natural lives from the time the bill shall be-come a law, that is certainly all that they can in justice expect. Neither they nor their friends ought to ask any more of us. If by reason of their participation in the rebellion, or from any other cause growing out of the war, the payment of their pensions was stopped, it is not our place now to pay them such arrears and remunerate them for their misfortune.

Almost every one, North and South, made sacrifices and met with losses of one kind or another during the war. Such was the inevitable result of the war. And for us, in this case, to make good to these parties losses thus sustained by them—for that is what it will amount to—will be to establish a precedent far-reaching and dangerous in its character; one which, if followed as it undoubtedly will be, will in a little while deplete the public Treasury and bankrupt the Government. It will require an appropriation of more than $500,000 to comply with the requirements of this section, should it be retained and the bill become a law. But this sum, large though it be, will be but a trifle, when compared with the millions that will follow it. There will be no end to the number or amount of claims that will be forced upon us if we open wide the door and invite their presentation by recognizing the justice and validity of this one. The fact that the parties who will be benefited by this section are old, infirm, and decrepit cannot alter the case. We cannot justify a vote for it upon any such ground; and unless we can put our support of it upon this ground alone I cannot conceive upon what principle it can be sustained.

The true theory upon which the whole pension system rests is that the Government, not as a debt, which it is compelled in honor to pay, but as a mere token of its appreciation of their patriotism and services, voluntary assumes the obligation of relieving the necessities of those who come to its rescue in the hour of its peril, when they shall need its aid. This the Government will do here, when it restores to the pension-roll the names of such soldiers of the war of 1812 as have been stricken from it by previous acts or joint resolutions of Congress, without paying them for the time they have been so suspended. We shall deal most liberally with all such when, overlooking their conduct during the war and blotting out all that stands charged against them for that time, we place them upon an equal footing in the future with their old comrades in arms.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk to be read some remarks made upon this subject in the last Congress by Mr. Butler, of Massachusetts

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Butler, of Massachusetts. I move to amend by striking out the following proviso at the end of the fifth section:

"Provided, That the restoration and pension contemplated herein shall take effect from the passage of this act."

The section to which this amendment is appended proposes to remove from the pensioners the disability imposed by the act of 1864. Now, it seems to me manifestly unjust that by this proviso we should confiscate the pension during the intervening time. While the war was going on, while the Union was still unrestored, it was a very proper thing to cut off the pensions of those who were disloyal. But I cannot see why the pensions of these men should be confiscated by the Government while no other property is confiscated. Therefore I desire a vote upon the question of striking out these words.

Mr. Sprague. The amendment would restore pensions which have been lost by reason of disloyalty during the rebellion; and we do not propose in this bill to put the disloyal upon an equality with those who have been faithful to the country. That is the objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. Butler, of Massachusetts. To that I make this answer: Those who had not served for sixty days or for any specified time are now put upon the pension-rolls. These men had, according to the judgment of Congress, rendered such service as to entitle them to a pension; it was their right which had been granted to them. The pension was their property, inalienable except on account of their disloyalty during the disloyalty and while the safety of the country required such a policy. But the time of danger is now passed; and I do not see why these old men should be deprived of their pensions while all other persons in the South are left to enjoy their property. If anybody wants to introduce a general confiscation act with reference to property in the South, I do not know whether I shall vote for it or not; but I certainly am not going to vote for confiscation unless

A MEMBER. What was the vote?

Mr. BLAND. The vote is not given. The amendment was adopted without opposition. The last House was two-thirds republican; yet that amendment was adopted; and the very amendment that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] called our attention to the other day as being a remarkably liberal proposition for that side to vote for was adopted by that House.

During the war it was contrary to public policy to pay these pensions in the South for two reasons. One was that the money itself might be used against the Government and in aid of those in hostility to it. Another reason was that the necessities of war required that the lines of communication should be closed. But, as was said by Mr. Butler in the argument just read, this is a debt which belongs to those parties, and to deny it to them now, after the reason for the act which prevented their receiving these pensions has ceased, is simply a confiscation of their property, and the only confiscation so far as I know that has ever taken place under this Government. Shall it be said that the men of the Revolution, the soldiers of the war of 1812, alone are to be the subject of confiscation by the Congress of the United States? Will the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Hale,] as he has done, still insist that on this side of the House are the only friends those soldiers have? Ideny that is the fact; and the sentiment of that side of the House, as expressed on the point the other day when this bill was being considered, as well as during the last Congress, shows that he does not represent his colleagues on this floor or his constituents.

I say it is but justice to these old men, and, as was remarked in a previous Congress, if they did err, their many services to this country and by their acts making it possible we should have a country entitled them to err at least once in their lives. Shall we vote a million and a half of dollars for a centennial show and exhibition and deny the patry sum due these men who made it possible for us to have such exhibition in this centennial year? What would foreign nations and peoples coming to our country say of a Congress and country which voted this subsidy to a private corporation and yet denied to the patriots who preserved this country in its time of peril their just

Mr. JENKS. I wish to offer a substitute for the amendment now under consideration, to be inserted as a proviso at the close of the fifth

Mr. HUNTON. I ask that the pending amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] as modified by the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS,] which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "62," in line 11, and add the following proviso: Provided, That no money shall be paid to any one on account of arrears during the term of his disability, except the widows of revolutionary pensioners.

Mr. JENKS. I move as a substitute for that the following proviso: The Clerk read as follows:

And provided, That under the provisions of this act no arrears of pension shall be paid for any portion of time during the existence of rebellion to any one who either participated in the rebellion or held any office therein under the so-called southern confederacy.

Mr. JENKS. Mr. Chairman, a nation's true glory consists in the favorable opinion of men of wisdom and discernment, and that favorable opinion must always depend upon the justice and benefi-cence of its legislation. Justice ought always to be first, beneficence second, and there is no attribute of a government that so fully comsecond, and there is no attribute or a government that so fully commands the respect of all mankind as that it shall be strictly just. Our honorable friend from New York, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] who is always apt to go to the very verge of either right or wrong, if he be going in any direction, goes to the very verge of beneficence. He proposes now to pension and pay the arrears which may have accrued during the pendency of the late civil war. This would be giving a primary consideration to beneficence, but it would forget justice. The Government of the United States ought not, and cannot in justice be called upon, to pay a pension to the very hand that is striking at the national life at the time that blow is suspended. It cannot be instified on any life at the time that blow is suspended. It cannot be justified on any principle of international law ever known. Yet these pensions ought to be paid from the expiration of the civil war.

This section has in contemplation only invalid pensions. There is a distinction between an invalid pension and a pension to those who are not invalids, in this, that the invalid pension is really a debt of a high order, while a pension to those who are not invalids is a mere gratuity. Hence, the pensions to these invalids being a debt could not be confiscated if we could not confiscate the same debt when we were carrying on a foreign war. If we were carrying on a war against a foreign nation under the law of nations, we could and would, so far as anything that would aid the subjects of that nation in carrying on that war, confiscate anything due to a citizen of the nation at that time. Hence, during the existence of that war, during the existence of the rebellion—and a rebellion never stands on higher ground than a foreign war—during the existence of that rebellion we ought not to pay any pension to any man who is striking at the life of the Government; but, it being a debt, the very moment the rebel laid down his arms just that moment the Government, if it is going to do so, should grant amnesty, and the whole past should go into oblivion. As to these old soldiers, let us pay them from the moment they laid down their arms, but do not let us place ourselves in the position of paying to any man during the existence of the civil war who was striking at the national life any pension or any gratuity.

I therefore ask my amendment be added as a proviso to the fifth section. We say it is just, and that these invalid pensions are a debt of a high order. This fifth section only relates to them. They stand in the relation of having lost some limb or been wounded, or having contracted some disease in the line of their duty in the defense of their country's flag. They themselves must bear the anguish and the pain, and must bear the mortification perhaps of deformity. For this the Government cannot pay them. But it can remunerate them for actual loss; and this is done in the shape of a pension paid them year by year for the proportionate loss they have sustained each year in consequence of that injury which they received while fighting for their country. Hence, this being a debt, and as it is owing to a class of men who are eminently meritorious and who must be at least seventy-seven years of age, we say pay these old men, grant them their pension and their arrears from the moment they laid down their arms against the Government, but not before. And this will be effected if we amend the section in the way I propose.

we amend the section in the way I propose.

Mr. COOK rose.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know the effect of the adoption of the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Jenks.] I think I understand it, and I want the House to understand it. As I understand, if the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania be adopted, the fifth section will stand as it is with that substitute added to it as a proviso. Am I correct?

The CHAIRMAN. In reply to the gentleman from Virginia, the Chair would state that he understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to offer the amendment that has just been read by the Clerk as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wis-

onsin, [Mr. Caswell.]

Mr. HUNTON. I understand that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair then states that the conclusions of the gentleman from Virginia are correct. If the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is adopted, the fifth section will stand as it now does, with the addition of the words contained in the substitute.

Mr. COOK. I had trusted, Mr. Chairman, and hoped that this bill would have passed almost without discussion, as it did in the last session of Congress. Some gentlemen have deemed it proper to intersion of Congress. Some gentiemen have deemed it proper to interpose objections to it now which were not offered to it then. I should not have said anything on the subject if it had not been for the remarks of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Hale,] and probably will not now, except to call the attention of that gentleman, who has always, when he has taken the floor, shown himself a very fair-minded account whenever he hears of a southern claim being presented. man except whenever he hears of a southern claim being presented to Congress, and he is then like a mad dog in the sight of water, rather rabid—except, I say, to call the attention of that gentleman to the fact that by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States the whole of this question has been settled.

The facts of the case are that under the law of the country these parties had a right to this pension. It had been given to them and was severed to them. They had anioned it for some Decision to was secured to them. They had enjoyed it for years. was secured to them. They had enjoyed it for years. During the rebellion, necessarily and properly, it was suspended. Upon the close of the rebellion, the President of the United States, by authority of Congress, issued his amnesty proclamation, and the Supreme Court have held repeatedly, and continued to repeat that decision whenever a case was brought before them, that that restored every human being in this country to all his rights of property and all his other rights.

The first case that came up—I ask the attention of the gentleman from The first case that came up—I ask the attention of the gentleman from Maine; I will not make a speech, but I will simply read the authority for what I am saying, and I ask the attention of the gentleman from Maine, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] and my other friends on that side—the first case that came up was that of Garland, who sought to be admitted to practice in the Federal court, but could not take the oath that he had never engaged in the rebellion. And when he came forward and presented himself in this building to resume his practice before the Supreme Court, and that point was made upon him the court gave a decision in language which I shall and to resume his practice before the supreme Court, and that point was made upon him, the court gave a decision in language which I shall read, Chief Justice Chase being on the bench, a man whose loyalty to the Government has never been questioned, whose integrity and good faith as a man have never been doubted, and whose learning and ability as a lawyer and a judge are universally recognized in this Exclusion from the practice of the law in the Federal courts, or from any of the ordinary avocations of life for past conduct is punishment for such conduct. The exaction of the eath is the mode provided for ascertaining the parties upon whom the act is intended to operate.

The act being of this character partakes of the nature of a bill of pains and penalties, and is subject to the constitutional inhibition against the passage of bills of attainder, under which general designation bills of pains and penalties are included.

In the exclusion which the act adjudges it imposes a punishment for some of the acts specified which were not punishable at the time they were committed, and for other of the acts it adds a new punishment to that before prescribed, and it is thus within the inhibition of the Constitution against the passage of an expost facto within the imminion of the Constitution upon the President is unlimited except in cases of impeachment. It extends to every offense known to the law, and may be exercised at any time after its commission, either before legal proceedings are taken or during their pendency, or after conviction and judgment. The power is not subject to legislative control.

And therefore this Congress by the act it had passed prescribing this oath could not deprive Mr. Garland of his right to practice before that court, and he was admitted. I will not read the decision. It is a long one. This case is in the fourth volume of Wallace's Reports of Supreme Court cases.

Again, in the ninth volume there is the case of a man from the State of Georgia, who had a claim against the Government for property seized. They decided in that case the same question, and I will read the decision briefly:

But it has been suggested that the property was captured in fact, if not lawfully; and that the proceeds having been paid into the Treasury of the United States, the petitioner is without remedy in the Court of Claims unless proof is made that he gave no aid nor comfort to the rebellion. The suggestion is ingenious, but we do not think it sound. The sufficient answer to it is that after the pardon no offense connected with the rebellion can be imputed to him. If in other respects the petitioner made the proof which, under the act, entitled him to a decree for the proceeds of his property, the law makes the proof of pardon a complete substitute for proof that he gave no aid or comfort to the rebellion.

I read further:

1. Claimants under the captured and abandoned property act of March 12, 1263, are not deprived of the benefits of that act because of aid and comfort not voluntarily given by them to the rebellion.

2. But voluntarily executing as surety, through motives of personal friendship to the principals, the official bonds of persons acting as quartermasters or assistant commissaries in the rebel army, was giving aid and comfort to the rebellion, although the principals by their appointment to the offices named escaped active military service and were enabled to remain at home in the discharge of their offices respectively.

3. Taking presession of a city by the national forces was not of itself and with respectively.

3. Taking possession of a city by the national forces was not, of itself, and without some actual seizure of it in obedience to the orders of the commanding general, a capture within the meaning of the act of the cotton which happened to be in the city at the time of the entry of the forces.

4. Hence, where prior to any such seizure an owner of cotton, who, though opposed to the rebellion, had given aid and comfort to it to the extent above mentioned, but was not within any of the classes excepted by the President's proclamation of December 8, 1863, and in regard to whose property in the cotton no rights of third persons had intervened—took the oath prescribed by that act and kept it. Held, after a seizure and sale of the cotton by the Government, that he was entitled to the net proceeds as given to loyal owners under the abandoned and captured property act. Having been pardoned, his offense in executing the bonds, could not be imputed to him.

I read, sir, now from 13 Wallace in the case of the United States vs. Klein, appealed by the United States from the court below:

vs. Klein, appealed by the United States from the court below:

1. The act of March 12, 1863, (12 Statutes at Large, 820.) to provide for the collection of abandoned and captured property in insurrectionary districts within the United States, does not confiscate or in any case absolutely divest the property of the original owner, even though disloyal. By the seizure the Government constituted itself a trustee for those who were entitled, or whom itshould thereafter recognize as entitled.

2. By virtue of the act of 17th of July, 1862, authorizing the President to offer pardon on such condition as he might think advisable, and the proclamation of 8th of December, 1863, which promised a restoration of full rights of property, except as to slaves, on condition that the prescribed oath be taken and kept inviolate, the presons who had faithfully accepted the conditions offered became entitled to the proceeds of their property thus paid into the Treasury, on application within two years from the close of the war.

3. The repeal, by act of 21st of January, 1867, (after the war had closed,) of the act of 17th of July, 1862, authorizing the Executive to offer pardon, did not alter the operation of the pardon, or the obligation of Congress to give full effect to it if necessary by legislation.

4. The proviso in the appropriation act of July 12, 1870, (16 Statutes at Large, 235.) in substance is in conflict with the views expressed in paragraphs 1, 2, and 3, above, and is unconstitutional and void. Its substance being that an acceptance of a pardon without a disclaimer shall be conclusive evidence of rights conferred by it, both in the Court of Claims and in this court, it invades the powers both of the judicial and of the executive departments of the Government.

With that provise in it, it became a law, and that provise is what

With that proviso in it, it became a law, and that proviso is what the Supreme Court has declared unconstitutional and void. I believe it was known as the Drake amendment. I do not know whether the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] was in that Congress, or whether he voted for it or not.

It was, in fact, promised for an equivalent, "pardon and restoration of political rights" were "in return" for the oath and its fulfillment. To refuse it would be a breach of faith not less "cruel and astounding" than to abandon the freed people whom the Executive had promised to maintain in their freedom.

And, yet from the expiration of those two years to this hour, the door of the court has been perpetually shut against these applicants, and it stands so to-day, and it is the law requiring this oath which has closed the doors of your Pension Office against these old pensioners.

It was urged in argument that the right to sue the Government in the Court of Claims is a matter of favor; but this seems not entirely accurate. It is as much the duty of the Government as of individuals to fulfill its obligations. Before the establishment of the Court of Claims claimants could only be heard by Congress.

I read further:

I read further:

Now it is clear that the Legislature cannot change the effect of such a pardon any more than the Executive can change a law. Yet this is attempted by the provision under consideration. The court is required to receive special pardons as evidence of guilt, and to treat them as null and void. It is required to disregard pardons granted by proclamation on condition, though the condition has been fulfilled, and to deny them their legal effect. This certainly impairs the legal authority and directs the court to be instrumental to that end.

We think it unnecessary to enlarge. The simplest statement is the best.

We repeat that it is impossible to believe that this provision was not inserted on the appropriation bill through inadvertence; and that we shall not best fulfill the deliberate will of the Legislature by denying the motion to dismiss and affirming the judgment of the Court of Claims, which is accordingly done.

That was the earnest, forcible, clear, impressive language of the Chief Justice of the country in reviewing all these matters immediately after the war, and no man contributed more by his counsels, his unwearying uniform exertion, in sustaining the war against the rebellion than did that man; but he felt a solemn responsibility to the obligation he owed as a judge on the bench of the supreme legal authority under the Constitution of his country.

I will only say in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, when the descendants of these men may be challenged to show their patriotism in defense of their country, I undertake to say that the men who confronted them at Sharpsburgh and in the Wilderness will not question or doubt their courage as brave men. Sir, this measure is but just; it is in conformity with the proclamation of your President, with the solemn adjudicated decisions of your courts; it is in accordance with the good sentiment throughout the country, that these persons should be restored to their rights, and I say that the men of the North and the West would feel aggrieved when they had denied to the ancestors of his fellow-soldiers the pittance the Government owes them.

Mr. KASSON. I have been somewhat troubled to find out the real significance of this pension bill. I think it possible that my examination of the previous laws may aid some other gentlemen in coming to a correct judgment upon this bill, and may illustrate in some degree the theory upon which it is framed.

To begin, I find that it proposes a complete substitute for the law of 1871, and then it proceeds to re-enact nearly every provision of that law except that which excludes from the benefits of the act a certain class of disloyal pensioners. It does, however, accomplish certain class of disloyal pensioners. It does, however, accomplish this other result, also, to reduce the period of service from sixty days to ten days, so far as the soldiers of the war of 1812 are concerned.

Then, hanging upon this simple change of a reduction of time of service, come these other new provisions to which I will refer, and service, come these other new provisions to which I will refer, and upon which depend the appropriation annually of a very large sum of money, a very considerable immediate appropriation in gross for arrearages, and an unknown amount of appropriations called for in the future by the theory upon which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cook] stands who last spoke, and also by the theory upon which they propose to repeal the laws of 1862 and the other laws establishing a disability because of rebellion. I think therefore it is fair to say that upon the consideration of this bill upon those grounds depends somewhere from one to two score of millions of dollars, I am not certain but I ought to say three score millions. When you say that the imposition of these disabilities was a violation of the contract between the Government and the pensioner, and that you violation. that the imposition of these disabilities was a violation of the contract between the Government and the pensioner, and that you violated the Constitution (upon the theory attributed to Chief Justice Chase) by what you have done, which is the point contended for on that side of the House, then clearly you must go back and pay the entire arrearages of the last fourteen years due to persons engaged in rebellion, amounting to an aggregate of many millions.

The question, then, is one of vast importance. If this bill shall receive in its present form the favorable consideration of this Committee of the Whole, then when it comes before the House I shall ask permission to submit a motion to recommit this bill in order that we may have more full information and report from the committee.

Now, sir, had we a right to cease the payment of money to the pensioners of the United States because of the fact that they were at the time seeking to destroy the Government and the nation which was paying them? Had we a right to do that? Or was the granting of a pension for past services a contract of so high a nature that we must continue to pay that pension to an enemy of the country in battle against it? That is the ground contended for by those who favor against it? That is the ground contended for by those who favor this proposition to pay arrearages. I venture to state that not a statesman or publicist upon either side of the ocean ever contended that the most solemn contract known, that of a treaty between nations, requires the payment of money called for even by treaty while that country is an enemy. Even upon the settlement of a peace the whole question is re-opened, as to the moral obligation implied to carry out a previous expressed contract. Then I set that not only carry out a previous expressed contract. Then I say that, not only because we would, in paying this money, have aided an enemy to destroy the Government which paid it, not only on that ground, but also on the ground that nothing in the shape of a contract terminated by war-legislation could continue after the war unless restored by legislation, we cannot be called upon to pass this bill.

Again, the granting of these pensions now under consideration was an act of sovereign gratuity by the Government in recognition of the services supposed to have been rendered by the pensioners; and every pensioner is constantly at the discretion of his Government as to the amount of his compensation and as to the continuance of his pensioner is constantly at the discretion of his discretion of his compensation. That being so, on both grounds, because the pensioner was at the time an enemy of the country that paid the pension and because, whether enemy or not, the whole subject is one of legislative discretion, I contend that to-day the question may be treated by us as an entirely new question. It presents itself in this simple form: Ought we to pay these men now in question, and not yet restored to the pension-roll, the amount which has been paid to the others, who remained

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?
Mr. KASSON. Certainly.
Mr. BLAND. Inasmuch as the last House passed this same bill, why did not the gentleman then make his able speech in opposition to its passage at that time, when General Butler was advocating it?

MASSON I am not aware that this bill was then presented for

Mr. KASSON. I am not aware that this bill was then presented for action in its present form to this House. If so, it escaped my attention at that fime.

Mr. BLAND. As shown by the record, this House adopted the same provisions, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] made no objection.

Mr. KASSON. Including the arrearages?

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. KASSON. Having taken no part in the consideration of that bill, I come to this one to-day as a fresh question, and I leave to gentlemen who did participate in it to make the requisite explanation as to differences between the two bills.

Mr. CASWELL. If the gentleman will permit me I will say that I have here a copy of the bill said to have been passed by the last

House of Representatives, I fail to find in it any clause which provides for the payment of arrearages; if there be such a clause I would vides for the payment of arrearages; if there be such a clause I would thank any gentleman to point it out.

Mr. KASSON. I am told by gentlemen that there was no such clause in that bill. Now, to go on with the consideration of this question, because I want to treat it with perfect fairness.

Mr. JENKS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. KASSON. Certainly.

Mr. JENKS. Do you understand this bill to provide for the payment of arrearages to any pensioner now living, or to his heirs, if ment of arrearages to any pensioner now living, or to his heirs, if dead ?

Mr. KASSON. Yes, sir; it does this: It says in effect that if a soldier died bearing arms against the Government of the United States all that would have been due to him up to the time of his death is payable to his minor heirs or his widow, if there is one.

Mr. JENKS. That is not in the bill.

Mr. KASSON. It is in the last section. The sixth section pro-

That the surviving widow of any pensioner of the war of 1812, where the name of said pensioner was stricken from the pension-rolls in pursuance of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to strike from the pension-rolls the names of such persons as have taken up arms against the Government, or who have in any manner encouraged the rebels," approved February 4, 1862, and where said pensioner died without his name being restored to the rolls, shall be entitled to the arrearages of pension due said pensioner at the time of his decease; and the marriage of such widow shall not prevent her from receiving such arrearages of pension. In case there is no surviving widow, then such arrearages of pension shall, upon similar proof, go to the minor children of such pensioner.

Mr. JENKS. Does not that refer to an invalid and not to a sturdy

Mr. KASSON. It refers to the man whoever he was that had a pension.

Now, I want to say that this bill goes further in its purpose to benefit soldiers who fought against the Union than any bill ever passed within my knowledge for the benefit of the soldiers who fought to maintain the Union. We are continually getting letters (at least I am receiving them) from unfortunate people whose pensions have been cut off by the statute of limitations, who are not permitted to come in and get the pensions that they unquestionably would have been entitled to if they had applied in time. I have now in my desk a letter from a widow representing her case—a simple failure to make her application in time; and our laws have not extended the time for the benefit of such persons.

It is proposed now by this bill to pay to the widow and children arrearages covering a period when the husband or father was actually warring against the United States. If gentlemen appeal to me as an individual and say: "Here is a case for charity; the widows or minor children of men who fought against the Government are in distress children of men who fought against the Government are in distress," they are welcome to the share of such charity that I can give. But the demand is upon the Government of the United States, as an act of justice; we are asked to go further for the widows and orphans of those who died in the rebellion than our present laws allow us to go for the relief of widows and orphans of those who fought to save the Government. For them our bills allow no arrearages. I cannot support a bill which, upon the theory of magnanimity and generosity, goes further than we have hitherto gone on the theory of justice and actual compensation. For this reason I submit to gentlement a both actual compensation. For this reason I submit to gentlemen on both sides of the House that they are demanding too much of members, at least on this side of the House, when they ask support for a bill of this nature

You will observe also, Mr. Chairman, that in the fifth section of the Great Britain" have been stricken out; and in striking those out you have opened the whole question of the Mexican-war pensioners; you have brought all the soldiers of that war under the same provision. Hence the theory that the soldiers of the war of the Revolution and the war of 1812 were too old to do much harm to their country in the late war—a theory which is very just, a declaration which I do not dispute in the main—is done away with by enlarging the bill to take in all the soldiers of the late Mexican war who were disloyal. And we cannot fail to recollect that one of those soldiers was at the head of the confederate government. Therefore they were not too old to have participated in the effort to overthrow the Government of the United States. Yet that modification is made very quietly; and the bill since it was reported is certainly made broad enough to take in all this class of soldiers.

Mr. DE BOLT. The gentleman is under a mistake in saying that the bill takes in all soldiers of the Mexican war; it only includes those who were previously pensioned.

Mr. KASSON. Of course I meant those included within the terms of the bill, not all surviving soldiers of the war of 18.2, but all those who would be covered under the provisions of the bill.

What else does this bill propose? It proposes, according to the estimate of the Commissioner of Pensions, to add 5,680 men to the pension-rolls by reason of the reduction of the time from sixty days to ten days; and the House has since gone on and by an amendment made that five days. How many more are thus added we have no estimate, because the Commissioner of Pensions has not been interrogated upon this point. The widows added under the ten days' clause would be 1,620. But even the limitation to widows who were married prior to 1850 has been struck out; so that it includes all widows up to 1876. Of the number thus included there has been no estimate offered. Of those married prior to 1850 the number to be added mate offered. Of those married prior to 1850 the number to be added to the pension rolls, according to the estimate of the Commissioner of Pensions, is 15,000, making 22,300 names to be added to the pension-rolls and requiring an annual appropriation of $2,140,000. If such unprecedented provisions were required for pensions of invalids—if it were necessary upon the principles on which pensions are granted that this should be done—not one word of objection would be heard. But the question presented to the House is whether we are not carrying the pension laws to the extreme of a dangerous precedent when we get down to what is called a five days' service of a man not an invalid and counting from the time the man started from his home. we get down to what is called a five days' service of a man not an invalid, and counting from the time the man started from his home as a minute-man until the time he got back again. I suggest to the House that it ought to be considered by a committee whether it does not establish a very dangerous precedent, and abolish the special honor of a pensioned soldier, to enact a pension law making no distinction between service proper and the simple opportunity for service ice.

Mr. BLAND. Did not that amendment come from the other side of the House

Mr. KASSON. That is very possible. I am speaking irrespectively of sides of the House on this question.

Mr. BLAND. It came from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Hoskins.

Mr. KASSON. After we have refused on every pension bill that has been offered here for some years past to pay any arrears of pension whatever to the national soldier, it is now proposed to pay arrearages in the cases to which I have referred, alleged to be due to the

It is asking, Mr. Chairman, too much from gentlemen who recognize the demands of the country, the merits of the soldiers who have fought for the country, and the distinctive claims of justice as existing between soldiers who sustained the Government and those who sought to overthrow it.

Mr. DUNNELL obtained the floor.

Mr. HUNTON. I do not desire to hamper debate, but we are in the Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule, and I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to that fact.

The Record discloses the fact. After I had concluded a remark or two, as the Congressional Record will show, I asked unanimous consent that the bill be considered section by section under the fiveminute rule. I further stated that, as some gentlemen desired to offer amendments, they could introduce them better by considering the bill section by section under the five-minute rule. No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. Such appears to be the fact that, by unanimous consent, the committee agreed for that day to consider the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to inquire whether an agreement of that kind made in committee can bind the committee in the discussion of the bill this day just as though an order were made under the rules in the House for the limitation of debate to the five-minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. If the agreement, as reported by the gentleman from Virginia, was made in the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, and not in the House itself, it is competent for this committee to disregard that arrangement.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will not insist on the limitation of debate at this time.

Mr. BLAND. When the motion was made to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill, there was incorporated that the consideration of the bill in the committee should be under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the House was in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union at the time the request was made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Hunton] for limitation of the debate to the five-minute rule, and was agreed to unanimously. If so, it is not competent, the Chair holds, for the committee to limit debate contrary to the rule of the House if there be objection at this time.

Mr. HUNTON. It is true that the agreement was made in the Committee of the Whole, but it was made by unanimous consent. In my judgment the Committee of the Whole have the right, by unanimous consent, to make such an order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will restate its opinion that the agreement having been made in the Committee of the Whole, although made by unanimous consent, it does not bind the committee now contrary to its own preference. Does the gentleman insist on his point that the committee shall consider this under the five-minute rule?

Mr. HUNTON. I understand the ruling of the Chair to be that I cannot insist on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the gentleman cannot insist upon it contrary to the preference of the committee.

Mr. HUNTON. Unless a majority of the committee rescind that order I ask then that the order limiting the debate to the five-minute

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks that the rule adopted by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider this bill under the five-minute rule shall apply to the discussion during this day. Is there any objection?

Mr. HOAR. The Chair will pardon me. I do not wish to prolong the discussion of this point, but it is important to the rights of the minority to preserve the unfettered privilege of debate and amendment in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. That is the only value of the rule of the House which sends certain classes of questions to the Committee of the Whole. I therefore must insist, if the gentleman desires to limit debate, upon his going into the House to obtain the order which is requisite under the rules.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Is it not competent for the Committee of the Whole to determine for itself, by unanimous consent, under what rule the debate shall continue? Such has been the practice, but if the decision is now otherwise we can go into the House and make the

The CHAIRMAN. The ruling of the Chair is that it is competent for the House to limit the debate in the committee on a measure of this kind, but that it is not competent for the committee itself to make such an order. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows that by unanimous consent the debate was limited the other day to the fiveminute rule. The gentleman from Virginia asks that be the limita-tion to-day, and the Chair decides that such cannot be done against the preference of the committee.

Mr. HUNTON. I withdraw the point of order for the present.
Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Chairman, I will not occupy more than the five minutes allotted me in what I have to say on the pending bill. I have watched its progress with a great deal of interest. I did hope it would come before the House in such a manner that it could be passed unanimously as a similar bill was passed in the last two Congresses. I am well aware and satisfied that the whole country will gresses. I am well aware and satisfied that the whole country will sustain the House in placing upon the pension-roll the few remaining old men who served in the war of 1812. The Senate, during the last Congress, as well as in the Forty-second Congress, set itself against the popular will when it refused to pass the bills for pensioning these old soldiers which had already passed this House.

Now, sir, there are but few of these old soldiers of the war of 1812

Now, sir, there are but few of these old soldiers of the war of 1812 remaining. They are old and generally poor and destitute. Five years ago, when I took my seat in this House, five of them lived in my district, and during the next year four of them made a pilgrimage to my residence, their neighbors giving them the means so that they might in person learn perchance whether Congress was going to be liberal enough to place them upon the pension-roll. I assured them again and essin edges the wish and intention of the Horse but assured the wish and intention of the Horse but assured the wish and intention of the Horse but assured the wish and intention of the Horse but as the second of the wish and intention of the Horse but as the second of the wish and intention of the Horse but as the second of the wish and intention of the Horse but as the second of the wish and intention of the Horse but as the second of the wish and intention of the Horse but as the second of the wish and intention of the Horse but as the second of the wish and intention of the Horse but as the second of the wish and intention of the Horse but as the second of the wish and intention of the Horse but as the second of the wish and intention of the Horse but as the second of the wish and intention of the Horse but as the second of the wish and intention of the Horse but as the second of the wish as the second of the wish and intention of the Horse but as the second of the wish as the them again and again of the wish and intention of the House, but was compelled at the same time to admit the unwillingness of the Senate to pass the bills which had passed the House.

in that it proposes, first to restore to the pension-rolls those who were stricken off because of a supposed participation in the rebellion; and again, it proposes to pay arrearages. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to come to a compromise upon this measure; and certainly it would be a fair, a just, and a generous compromise to restore to the pension-rolls all those who were stricken off because of this supposed participation in the rebellion and let the arrearages provided for in the sixth section be stricken out. The bill, if the arrearages be made a part of it, can never pass the Senate. We know that fact, and I say we are justified in regarding it in the passage of this bill through the House. But I am satisfied that the country will sustain both the House and the Senate in restoring to the pension-rolls those who did participate in the rebellion, if nothing further be attempted.

I have never been able to count up against those old men in the South a very great crime. They were old and feeble. Their sons and sons-in-laws and their grandsons were in the rebellion. Suppose perchance they did sympathize. Back of all that sympathy had by these old men for the rebellion there was a period in their lives, a time when they were full-blooded, in their strength and in their manhood, when they were gallant defenders of the Republic. Back of that period I will go to find reasons for my support of this measure. I would restore them to the rolls and let them one by one pass off the stage, conscious that the Republic they had served in their youth recognized them, though late, and restored them to its rolls. Five of these men were in my district. One of them had served fifty-nine days and another fifty-five days. Two of them have gone, buried by charity, buried at the expense of the town in one instance. I say it is unworthy of this great Republic, rich in wealth, rich in prospective power, to let a gallant defender of the Republic die in that way. Although he served but one day, his spirit was ready. When his service was required, he threw himself into the breach and offered himself for all the service that his country required, no matter what that might be.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to pass this bill. We ought to be disposed fairly to compromise our differences. Restore to the pension-rolls those that were stricken from a supposed connection with the rebellion, and let the proviso which provides for arrearages be stricken out, as it must and would certainly fail in the Senate. I think we ought to pass the bill restoring to the pension-rolls all those who served in the war of 1812 for five days, whether they live to-day in the North or in the South, in the East or in the West. It would be a grand act, a gracious one on our part, and a just act, for which we could defend ourselves in the presence of the people, although I think we could not do so if we made provision for the arrearages to those who were dropped from the rolls during the war. Let us take a practical view of this question, and not fail in the main and chief result by clinging to impracticable conditions.

Mr. HURLBUT. I desire to say a few words in relation to this bill, and to say them without any hostility to any of the men who are especially sought to be relieved by this measure. I am compelled, sir, by a sense of duty to oppose this bill; because, in the first place, I believe the original bill as reported was vicious in substance and bad in form, and that the amendments which have been added to it have extended its scope, enlarged its viciousness, and made it more burdensome to the country.

First, sir, I desire gentlemen to consider here that there is not and cannot be any such thing as a vested right, a commercial transaction between the country and those who are the recipients of its bounty. Every nation has the right inherently to command the services of its citizens just whenever it calls for them, to call for their lives, to demand their money; and the measure of the citizen's duty is only limited by the necessities of the country. There is no contract of dollars and cents in that. So whoever may render service in a military capacity to the nation simply does his plain, unmistakable, undeniable duty, and whatever reward the nation may give him for having done that duty is in the line of free gift and grace, and not in the line of contract. And until this time I never heard any man talk of any such thing as a contract between the soldier and the nation giving him the right to a pension.

This is undoubtedly the state of the case. It is the history of all nations. It is the history of the branch of this nation which undertook to set up a separate government. Each party in the late civil war commanded by right the services of those who remained within its limits, and those who entered the service simply obeyed the call of duty in doing so; and whatever

Now, it is true that there are scattered through this country not a great many men, but some survivors who have rendered good service in the war of the Revolution. A few still remain of the war of 1812; a few more of the Mexican war. And now I come to the real proposition which lies at the bottom of this bill. It has been shown here by my friend from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] that, by a most ingenious dropping out of certain words that attracted no particular attention at the time, all the pensioners of the Mexican war in the Southern States are included within the provisions of this bill.

Now, sir, as there are duties belonging to a citizen toward his government, so there are donations which the Government may make to that citizen for the performance of his duty; so it follows correlatively that there may be a forfeiture of the right to these gratuities, and these forfeitures have been inflicted on certain persons who, having earned the gratitude of the nation by previous good services, forfeited that right by abandoning the very nation they had formerly served. I care nothing about the motives, but I say that they abandoned their country in the hours of its extremest need. Now, if any one should say that these men did not forfeit and abandon by their action all the right and all the claim they may have had against the Government for their previous service, he would be saying what no man of good sound sense it seems to me would admit. Now, the point is, that it is proposed to extend the elemency of this Government, the good-nature of this Government, the lavishness of this Government,

For one, I am disposed to do just simply this: whenever the friends of this bill will so limit it down to parties who had joined in resisting the Government; men who, being pensioners of the Government, yet conspired with its enemies; men who in the plain, clear light of the unamended Constitution, the Constitution as it was, the Constitution which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILL] says he hugged to his bosom when he went, the plain, strict construction of that Constitution defines what the crime treason is in leaving war against the United States—now, I am willing to signalize this time by giving to these men relief from now on, not because they deserve it, for they do not, but I will do it because I wish the magnanimity of this country in this matter to stand unquestioned before the world. But when you ask me in addition to that to add provisions to this bill which do not apply to our own soldiers and their widows and orphans; when you ask me to do to the men who according to their abilities undertook to destroy the Union what is not done to our own men, I resist took to destroy the Union what is not done to our own men, I resist it, and I say that the public sentiment of the country never will bear out any such pattering with the plain principles of justice. I call the attention of this House and I call the attention of every member of the House, on both sides, to the real thing that is intended by the bill as amended. I call their attention to the increase of the pensioners of this country. I call their attention to the fact that in this bill and in no other that ever has been passed the widows and orphans of the men who died under this disability are allowed to recover all their arrearance accrained during the time of disability.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not my friend mistaken as to our never having passed a bill containing that provision? It seems to me there was a similar provision in the bill which passed the House upon the 14th day of March, 1874, upon the subject of pensions.

Mr. HURLBUT. Ah, but that is not the law.

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course not.

Mr. HURLBUT. You mean the bill that passed the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understood you to say that no such bill had passed

Mr. HURLBUT. If I said that I spoke incorrectly. I meant to say that no such bill had become a law. Now, if gentlemen desire to get rid of the impressions already prevalent in the public mind that this carefully worded and skillfully managed bill is simply an entering-wedge to a vast number of bills behind, they will send the bill to the committee and strip it of all these unnecessary things and render not justice but charity and mercy to these surviving men, who were carried away by excitement during the late war. When they put the bill in that shape they will have my support, and not until then.

Mr. HUNTON. I move that the committee rise, and I make the motion for the purpose of moving in the House to go into Committee of the Whole again with a limitation of five minutes on debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman that, in order to avoid the necessity of going into the House, he ask unanimous consent that the debate be limited to five minutes.

Mr. HOSKINS. I do not object to the arrangement nor to the obect the gentleman has in rising, but I desire to remind the gentleman from Indiana that an arrangement has already been made to-day in reference to this bill, that the debate should not be limited until the close of the session to-morrow, and it is not in the power of the Committee of the Whole even by unanimous consent to change that arrangement. The House only can do it. I think therefore it is neces-The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that the gentleman from Indiana is asking, in order to obviate the necessity of going into the House, that now, by unanimous consent, the debate from this time shall be limited to five minutes. Is there any objection?

The Chair hears none, and it will be so understood.

Mr. CASWELL. While this bill was under consideration the other day it may have been supposed by some that I was antagonizing it. Sir, I am in favor of the principal features of this bill if gentlemen will divest it and take from it those objectionable features which are so unjustly laid upon the burdens of the soldiers of the war of 1812. The bill as it now stands would change all the pension laws of the United States. In addition to those features already pointed out by gentlemen, this bill proposes to change section 4716 of the Revised Statutes, which I desire to read:

No money on account of pensions shall be paid to any person or to the widow, children, or heirs of any deceased person who in any manner voluntarily engaged in, or aided or abetted, the late rebellion against the authority of the United

Now if you repeal that section a larger number will be upon the bension-roll than there has been since 1871, because all those whoso-pension-roll than there has been since 1871, because all those whoseever who were barred or are now barred because they subsequently participated in the rebellion may be added to the roll.

Now I say I am in favor of this bill, and for that reason I claim that it is unfair that we should tack on it a measure so radical and weighty as the one which is here proposed. If this bill should become a law we will be paying a pension to men for the very period when they were fighting against this Government. Does history furnish such an example? Is there anywhere in the history of any nation on earth a precedent to instify our paying men pensions during the very period precedent to justify our paying men pensions during the very period when they were fighting against their Government? Such an act on our part would be a novelty of generosity unheard of before. It would be a departure from every principle of self-government. How long can a government survive in the exercise of such political economy as that?

I do not wish to be harsh or unjust to anybody, and especially to the soldiers of the war of 1812, whether they live in the South or in the North. But I wish to preserve that consistency which every nation owes to itself, and not add a premium for rebellion against our country. If this bill shall now become a law it will go further in the direction of amnesty than any measure that has ever been advocated on this floor. Does my distinguished friend from New York, [Mr. Town-SEND, ] who so ably contended against universal amnesty, desire now to go much further than that bill contemplated? Why, sir, this bill will not only take them back, but will pay them $8 a month during the very period they were in rebellion. Or does the able gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Banks,] whose fidelity to the Government has never been questioned, desire to remove from the statute-book the only provision which makes a distinction between loyalty and disloyalty? Why not strike from the statute-book every provision which imposes a disability upon those in rebellion against their Gov-

Each of these measures may become popular in time, but let each measure stand alone on its merits, and not at this late day impose it as a weight upon the soldier of the war of 1812, and say that the pension shall be withheld from him until we shall strike down the statute imposing a disability for rebellion. It is an unjust burden to be laid upon these old soldiers; and I appeal to those who are really in favor of restoring pensions to these old men who have been so long knocking at the door of Congress, to strip this bill of its objectionable features, and put it in such a shape that it will be likely to become a

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to say a few words in reference to this bill, not that I believe any one of my constituents will be affected by it one way or the other. The opposition which has been made to it, it seems to me, is predicated upon an idea entirely inconsistent with the principle upon which the Government originally granted these pensions. With all due respect to the distinguished gentlemen who have spoken upon the opposite side of this Chamber, as to the principle which governed in the original grant of pensions, we have the extraordinary spectacle now presented to the country, both by the proclamations of your executives in former times and by the decisions of your Supreme Court solemnly made, that the class of persons who are affected by this bill shall not be debarred from entering your tribunals of justice and demanding compensation for the losses which they have sustained during the late war; and that by pardons, whether by general proclamation or by special act, they are restored to all their rights to claim in the tribunals of their country compensation for their property, whether for losses incurred while they were disloyal or not.

The decisions of your Supreme Court, in the cases referred to by my friend from Georgia, [Mr. Cook,] the case of Garland, and the

my friend from Georgia, [Mr. Cook,] the case of Garland, and the more recent case of Klein, went to the point that when a party had been pardoned he stood, as the adjudications of all the courts say he does stand, as if he had never committed the offense. In other words, that that offense has been obliterated by the act of the Government in granting pardon, and he is restored to all his rights, in the language of the Supreme Court, "precisely as if he had never committed the

Now shall the Congress of the United States, by refusing to pass this measure, say that, while they recognize the justice and propriety of these acts of the Executive Department of the Government, while they bow to the adjudications of the supreme judicial tribunal of the they bow to the adjudications of the supreme judicial tribunal of the land, they will make an invidious exception in regard to one class of citizens alone, those who were soldiers and toilers in your behalf in the war of 1812? That exception is much more invidious than the exception which was attempted to be grafted upon what was known as "the amnesty bill." It is an exception against a class of citizens who were granted pensions for services rendered long before they had committed an offense against the Government. If the Government in its elemency, acting either through its executive in the form of a pardon or through the decisions of the Supreme Court, will restore to the rebel citizens of the South their right to claim compensation for the loss of their property, why will you not restore the rights of the soldiers of the war of 1812 to be paid the pensions which the Government has given them? the Government has given them?

It has been said by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. Kasson,] and by other gentlemen who have spoken upon this question, that these pens ions are not of the nature of a contract between the Government on the one side and the veteran soldier on the other; that it is not a contract with the soldier to give him so much compensation for his

No, Mr. Chairman, it is not governed by any such simple mercantile relation. It was a donation for services rendered in a war with a foreign country. It was an acknowledgment of the services of these soldiers in that war. To say now that you will deny this pension to them because of an offense subsequently committed, is to say to the veteran soldiers of the war of 1812, a few of whom yet remain, (like the hemlock of the native region of the gentleman from Maine, dying at the top but still surviving,) and whose hope is that ere their death they may be recognized as having once rendered service to their country—

Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Cannot the Committee of the Whole, by unanimous consent, allow the gentleman to proceed?

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. Harris, of Virginia.) The Chair understands that by unanimous consent a few moments ago it was determined to adhere to the five-minute rule.

mined to adhere to the five-minute rule.

Mr. KASSON. I rise to oppose the amendment. That is in order; and I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER.] But in doing this, will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. HOOKER. Certainly.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the principle he is contending for does not extend to the allowance of all claims of those who were enemies for a time but who have now been restored.

those who were enemies for a time but who have now been restored to all the rights of citizens?

Mr. HOOKER. I was about to say that it seems to me an extreme

Mr. HOOKER. I was about to say that it seems to me an extreme act of injustice to this class of pensioners for the Government, forgetful of the services which they once rendered, to attempt now by withholding these arrearages of pensions to visit upon them punishment for an offense which they subsequently committed.

It is stated, sir, that the Israelites, when unable to drink the bitter waters of Marah, discovered atree which possessed the capacity of extracting the bitterness from the waters; and I had hoped that in this centennial period, in this era of good feeling between all sections of the country, we should be able to find in the record of these veterans of the war of 1812 something which might extract the bitterness from those waters of contest with reference to the rebellion, which some gentlemen here seem always ready to agitate. I had thought that this Congress of the United States was but the conduit-pipe by which the common sentiment of the American heart, with its desire to throw the common sentiment of the American heart, with its desire to throw oblivion over these contests, should find expression. I had thought that there would be no limit to the feeling of generosity toward the soldiers of the war of 1812 and the desire to cast the mantle of oblivion over the fierce civil contest which had agitated our country to its center. I had hoped that the spirit of amnesty and kindly feeling would come as naturally as the water from the mountain-side—

Giving a gentle kiss to every sedge He overtaketh in his pilgrimage; And so by many winding nooks he strays, With willing sport to the wild ocean.

I had hoped that we should not hear of restriction or of limitation or of any opposition to what a gentleman from Massachusetts has well said is but a simple act of justice.

Is it becoming for us now to say to these men, "True, you bared your breasts to the storm of war when the nation ranking as strongest upon the sea and upon the land was arrayed against your country; true, you shouldered your muskets and drew your swords in defense of that country; but you have committed an offense since. True, if you wanted to go into the courts of the country and prosecute your claim for property, this generous Government would forgive and forget the offense you have committed. Your offenses would not be remembered against you, if you were simply a party in court demanding compensation for property destroyed by the events of the war." But when the question is whether the Government shall forget an offense committed by these veterans of 1812, only a few of whom are now left to be solaced by our bounty and they trembling whom are now left to be solaced by our bounty and they trembling upon the verge of the grave, we propose to show no forgiveness. Is this just, or generous, or merciful?

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I will not detain the committee long. I desire to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Jenks] on two grounds. First, the original bill which came from the committee in the Forty-third Congress contained the following languages. following language:

On proof satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior that said pensioner did not take up arms against the Government or in any manner encourage the rebels.

This is similar to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The RECORD of that day shows that those words were stricken out by a vote of 92 to 54, and the bill as it went to the Senate restored the pensions of those soldiers who had been dropped under previous acts. I want to inquire now whether this House is less liberal than the Congress of two years ago? Has the shadow upon the dial of humanity gone back within these two years past and gone? Have the soldiers referred to manifested any new act of hostility that now they meet this opposition?

Another objection I have to the amendment is that it implies a censure upon the soldiers who were in the service on the southern side of the question. It carries with it the implication that those soldiers were to blame for bringing on the war. Allow me to say, Mr. Chairman, that of all the people in the South, the soldiers who went to the field and suffered were the least to blame. Where did the war commence? It did not commence in the hearts of the masses of the people of the South. The people there were for the Union. Where did the war commence? I believe it commenced in this Hall and in the other end of the national Capitol. Gentlemen made speeches here which were scattered broadcast over the land, and when the troubles came on eloquent men appeared before the masses and incited them to take up arms. Why, Mr. Chairman, they often said, "Go where glory waits thee," and some of these men said, "What a sweet and proper thing it is to die for one's country;" but many of them took good care not to die themselves worth a cent. [Great laughter.]

What is the effect of this amendment? The effect is to censure the soldier and to censure the plain men of the country; yet I undertake soldier and to censure the plain men of the country; yet I undertake to say to-day that these soldiers were less to blame than anybody else in that unhappy struggle.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. Harris, of Virginia, in the chair.) The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I did want to say one or two more things

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that the gentleman has one minute more of his time remaining.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. Allow me to say then just this, and I wish every gentleman present to hear it: If there were a foreign war, if there were any trouble to grow up between this and a foreign country, and God forbid there should be, because all men I think now desire peace; but let me say to you as a humble southern soldier himself, that if there were any trouble to-day with any foreign country no men on the top of God's green earth would respond more readily to that call than the men in gray.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. You want me to quit now, do you? Great laughter.] I regret I have not a few minutes more time.
Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I am constantly creasing in my notion that I was right originally in regard to this bill, for I find myself assailed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Jenks,] who takes one view; by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Cook,] who takes another view; and by my friends on this side of the House, who take all sorts of views. [Laughter.] Therefore am satisfied, when I am in opposition to so many opinions, I must have been right.

Now the committee that matured this bill was the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and the War of 1812. We matured a bill re-lating wholly to the pensioners of the war of 1812. We brought that lating wholly to the pensioners of the war of 1812. We brought that bill into this House, and if it had been left in its application to the pensioners of the war of 1812 I should feel I was doing here, as I felt I was doing in the committee, my duty to the pensioners and the country in sustaining that bill. But not upon the ground that the pensioner has the right with the muzzle of a pistol to demand of the country a pension! Good God! are we to have that doctrine presented here or anywhere else that a pensioner has the right to make such a demand of the country? Not at all. It is not upon any such It was upon the ground that these men had rendered efficient service, and it became the country to be liberal to them in turn. The service was all rendered before the pension was granted. What, sir, shall there be what was called "back pay?" Shall there be a distinction favorable to those pensioners of the war of 1812 that we do not grant to our soldiers who have more recently served the country? I would not do it. Our soldiers who have been recently invalided in the cause of their country are allowed their pensions from the date of the pension. So I would do by the pensioners of the war of 1812. I would allow pension from the time it was right, merely going back on the dial to 1862.

But let us not be mistaken. They say, "Townsend is softening."
[Laughter.] The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Jenks] has obliged me with an account of my character. He said I always run I am obliged to him, but I hope under Heaven I shall always be right when I am in extremes.

What do we propose to do? We propose to restore pensions to a body of men every one of whom in consequence of having served his country between 1812 and 1815 had in 1861 dragged a miserable, diseased, and maimed carcass for forty-five years, and who have now dragged that same diseased carcass to the borders of the grave for nearly sixty years. These were the men for whom I "slopped over." [Laughter.] These were the men to whom I proposed to give pensions; and if this House, if this committee, has gone beyond the view of the committee which reported this bill and added the pensioners of the war with Mexico, and therefore created some possible difficulty in regard to the matter, it is the fault of this committee, and not the fault of the committee which reported the bill.

Sir, I do not know but it will be wiser to send this bill back to the committee, and let us lick it into shape again. I am not certain but when the committee rises that should be done.

But I rose simply to vindicate the committee for the views that induced it to recommend that the old men who were tottering on crutches in 1861 should have the pensions they would have had but for the madness that existed at that period.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I have been denied the privilege of listening to this discussion by service on committee, and must speak somewhat at random. It has been claimed that to deny this arrearage of pension to these old soldiers is to strike at the sick, the maimed, and the helpless veterans of the war of 1812, and that if they forfeited their right to pension it was through the misthat if they forfeited their right to pension it was through the mis-fortunes of war and not by any fault of theirs; that they must have been nearly sixty years of age, and could not have participated act-ively in the rebellion. Admitting this, and passing by the fact that men at the age of sixty are far from being devoid of power and influ-ence in the communities where they reside, and conceding that they were innocent victims of the war, still, sir, we cannot forget the fact that they were not its only victims; and, if innocent, their case only furnishes another instance of that inexorable law whereby the inno-cent must suffer for the crimes of the quilty. And six we cannot furnishes another instance of that inexorable law whereby the innocent must suffer for the crimes of the guilty. And, sir, we cannot forget if we would who the guilty were and how they struggled for four years, not that these old veterans might not receive a pension, but that no true soldier of the Republic should ever receive a pension from its Treasury again! During that time they not only levied no tax and contributed no revenue for the payment of these suspended pensions, but they compassed the powers of earth and hell to prevent the United States from ever drawing support from them again for any purpose whatever, however just or humane. Victims, indeed! There is not a child in its cradle to-day, so far from drawing support from its country, that its labors are not mortgaged through life to the grave to discharge the debt imposed by this mad, wicked, and godless rebellion. godless rebellion.

Sir, I yield to no one, not even to my noble-hearted friend from New York, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] in sympathy for the sick and wounded soldier; but I do not forget and I cannot forget that there were other innocent victims of the rebellion besides these veteran soldiers. The great cloud of war stood over our northern homes, and to-day its shadow rests heavily on many a stricken heart, on many a broken shadow rests heavily on many a stricken heart, on many a broken household. Gather up the innocent blood and treasure poured out upon the ground by this unholy rebellion; bring back the health and cheer and comfort that have fled from happy hearth-stones; re-unite the broken family circles guilty of no crime but devotion to their country in its hour of deadly peril, and it will then be time to talk about mending all the misfortunes of the war by appropriations from the public Treasury. But so long as the sick and maimed Union soldier drags his diseased and mutilated body on toward the darkness of the grave, and when compelled to amply for special relief from Conof the grave, and when compelled to apply for special relief from Congress can only receive pension from the date of act granting such relief, I for one am unwilling to pay arrearages of pension to men fighting against their country, and deny it to those who perilled all in its defense. Sir, we have been admonished to remember the good feeling of the centennial year. Well, we think we have some pride and some interest in that as well as our friends on the other side, for we fought hard and sacrificed much to reach it. Could they have had their way there would never have been any centennial for this

But, sir, we doubt not that they come to the Centennial as we do, with joyful hearts, and we meet them without one vengeful feeling left. All we ask is that all over this land the era of the return of good feeling shall be real; that every citizen, even the humblest, shall be protected in all his rights; that sectional feeling shall die shall be protected in all his rights; that sectional feeling shall die out utterly; and that the American citizen, so long as he obeys the laws and comports himself like a good citizen, shall be welcome everywhere. Then will we celebrate our centennial year with joy indeed, with a united, happy, and prosperous country. But this feeling can never be genuine, can never come to stay, until we carry out that in action which we are so ready to express in words. The saddest sight I have seen on Capitol Hill this winter was that of a one-armed Union soldier who just at night-fall was leaving this building. He introduced himself and told me his name. He said he had just been dismissed from the employ of this House. With his right hand taking hold of the stump of his left arm, he said: "The remainder of that arm I left at Gettysburgh. I am going home now. I have no comarm I left at Gettysburgh. I am going home now. I have no complaint to make; I have served my country as well as I could, both in peace and war. My successor fought to destroy the country; I fought to defend it. If my country can stand that, I can." Ah, Mr. Chairman, that is what this country cannot stand and what it will not stand. No country can stand that. Patriotism cannot live by it; liberty will die under it. No; let the day of crimination and recrimination pass. Put back these invalid soldiers of 1812 on the pencrimination pass. Fut back these invalid solders of 1612 on the pension-rolls. Let their pay commence from the passage of the act, and let the door close there finally and forever. Let no man who fought for the late rebellion other than these ever hope to receive a pension. Let all come together in good faith, and for a common endeavor; let the soldiers of the two armies fraternize, and let all the people be again united. But, Mr. Chairman, we shall never see this, and we never ought to see it while maimed Union soldiers are sent hobbling down Capitol Hill and ex-confederates, sound in health and limb, are installed in their places. Gallantry does not demand it; justice scorns it; and humanity will reject and correct it.

Mr. HOSKINS. Mr. Chairman, no gentleman upon the floor of this House is more anxious than myself to do justice to the soldiers of the war of 1812. Those men who fought bravely to preserve and perpetuate this Government are entitled to our sympathy and regard. And in that view when the first section of this bill was under discussion I moved to reduce the term of service to the lowest possible period, five days, that we might reach every single soldier who served in the war of 1812 to save this country. But, sir, I find in the section of the bill now under consideration not only a provision to pension the men who were loyal to the Government during the struggle in which we have been engaged, but ernment during the struggle in which we have been engaged, but there is a proposition to restore to the pension-rolls a class of men who, if not in the active service of the rebellion, were—and I speak of it in no offensive terms—absolutely in sympathy with it, and as much under the control of the feelings that governed the men in those States as the men who were themselves in the service. Further than this, it is a proposition to pay every soldier of the war of 1812, whose name was stricken from the pension-rolls for disloyalty, full arrears of pension from the time his name was dropped to the present time. It is not only proposed to place their names on the pension-rolls but to penonly proposed to place their names on the pension-rolls, but to pension them during the war, when perhaps they were in open hostility to the Government. It seems to me it is quite enough to ask us to restore the names of these old soldiers of the war of 1812 to the pensionrolls from the present time forward, without insisting that arrears be paid them.

In my judgment the passage of this proposition will establish a precedent in this country against which the people all over the country will revolt almost as one man. It is quite too early in the history of this Government since the close of the war to come forward with a proposition here that shall not only place on the pension-rolls the class of men who live in the Southern States, unfortunately, I admit, and who under our laws were excluded from the pension-rolls, but also pay them full arrears the same as though they had not been stricken from the rolls for disloyalty.

Every man in the Southern States who can show his loyalty to the Government has been restored to the pension-rolls from which he was cut off by the provisions of the statute to which I have referred. And I say to gentlemen on the other side of the House and to gentlemen on this side of the House that while we wish to live in peace and harmony and union with every man in those Southern States, and do not desire to perpetuate any of the old feelings of animosity, yet we have a duty as representatives of the people to see that no one is placed upon the pension-rolls who was unfaithful to the Government in its hour of trial, or at least that no arrears are paid, even should he be a faithful soldier of the war of 1812. And I say again that it is a dangerous precedent for gentlemen on the other side to urge the restoration to the pension-rolls of these men, even if they were old soldiers of the war of 1812, who were in the service of the confederate government or in sympathy therewith, and much more to demand for them arrears of pensions. I appeal to gentlemen on the other side to eliminate from this bill all of these dangerous principles upon which we cannot agree; so that we shall agree to strike out the sixty days' service, and pension every soldier of the war of 1812 who establishes his loyalty to the Government. And if you desire the action of the House on the other proposition, bring your billin as a separate measure entirely; but do not ingraft upon this bill a provision placing on the pension-rolls a class of men who have been deprived of their privilege by law, which brings up for consideration another subject. I appeal to the gentlemen to let us strike out that provision of the bill, and we will pass it unanimously.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to discuss the merits of this bill, but as a member of the committee which reported it to the House I desire to make a statement. I was not present, sir, when this bill was discussed by the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, being engaged upon another committee at the time, but I was told by the committee as to the provisions of the bill, and at the time I stated, as will be remembered I think by those who were present, that for one I would absolutely oppose to pay any man a pension for the time he was actually engaged in rebellion against the Government. There was some discussion, and it was supposed that this bill included wounded and maimed soldiers, men who had been disabled on account of services to their country from 1812 to 1815, and could not possibly include many men who had absolutely engaged in the rebellion or were capable of rendering it any service. In that view I gave my assent to the proposition; in this view I gave my assent to this bill, with the understanding that it would not include those actually engaged in the rebellion; nor did I intend, as has been claimed by some gentleman here, that these persons should have any advantage over our own soldiers who served during the late war. If there is any such provision in the bill, I would, as a member of the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be opposed to it. I did not intend and I do not intend now that the bill should give such advantage; but, if it does, I say I am opposed to it, and opposed furthermore to paying any soldier a pension for time that he was actually engaged in warring against the Government of his country.

Sir, I repeat what the gentleman from New York [Mr. Townsend] has already said, that if it was the intention of the committee to give to men who periled their lives in the defense of their country in 1812 and 1815, and who gave to the country an arm or a leg, or lost their health, or were otherwise disabled, and who would be unable to give to the rebellion any valuable services-it was our intention to give to those who had been maimed and wounded in the service, and I say that I do not for one regret, so far as that is concerned, the action of the committee.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I have very little to say on this subject.

There is much I would like to say, but I cannot say it in five minutes, and I do not like to ask an extension of time.

There are three things which I will say within the five minutes. The first is to express my regret that gentlemen on the republican side of the House seem determined to go back on their record which their own party so generously made at the last session. It has been stated and, I believe, proved that this very provision in the bill now proposed to be stricken out was contained in a bill which passed this House in the Forty-third Congress by a large majority, if not by an entirely unanimous vote. This is the second time that gentlemen on that side of the House have manifested at this session of Congress a disposition to go back upon their entire action at the previous sessions of Congress, and I profess my profound regret at that exhibition of purpose or feeling. If the recurrence of a presidential election is to re-act in this kind of style, certainly every patriot ought to regret that presidential elections return at all.

The second remark which I wish to make is simply this. The question is simply whether these invalid soldiers of the war of 1812, or of previous wars, shall be restored to the pension-rolls and with the arrearages due them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish simply to state to the House that it fell to my lot to canvass the State of Georgia against secession. I had had no connection with politics previous to the war, except in opposing secession in every form. I did not believe in the doctrine of secession, and it was a hard contest. Gentlemen who come from the other side of the line cannot imagine the struggle which those of us had to endure in that region of country in those days. I do not allude to this to claim any credit for myself—none whatever; I did only what was my duty; but the fact I wish to state to the House is this, and it is a latter. and it is a duty I owe to these old men to state it: In traveling over the State of Georgia, under great disadvantages, laboring to the best of my ability to resist what I then considered, and still consider, the madness of secession, I never met one of these old invalid soldiers in whom I did not find a friend and an opponent to secession. I have known one of them to hobble for ten miles to hear my humble words in defense of the Union for which they fought, and I never met in all my struggles against secession one of them who was opposed to it.

The third thing I wish to say is a curious incident in our history.

Gentlemen seem desirous of excluding these men from the pensionrolls because of secession. Where did secession originate? Was it born in the South? Nay, sir; do not gentlemen know that at the very time the soldiers of the South who have been stricken from your pension-rolls were making breastworks of their own cotton bales at New Orleans to drive back the foreign invader of our country, the Northeast was in session at Hartford, and by her distinguished delegates proclaimed the very doctrine of secession upon which the South subsequently acted. Here it is: "That acts of Congress in violation of the Constitution are absolutely void is an undeniable proposition;" and they declare that the States have a right to judge of the measure of redress in case of such an event or emergency. [See note at foot

Mr. KASSON. Did any State ever indorse that doctrine?
Mr. HILL. I do not know; and I do not know that anybody who as engaged in that convention was ever stricken from the pensionrolls because he preached secession in New England.

Mr. KASSON. Ah, the men who were there had never been on the pension-rolls.

Mr. HILL. I am simply stating a fact of history, that at the very moment these men, now invalid soldiers, were exposing their lives at New Orleans for the common country you men in New England were engaged at Hartford in proclaiming the doctrine of secession.

A MEMBER. Does the gentleman justify that doctrine?

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a single procedure?

question?

Mr. HILL. I have not time now.

Mr. BLAINE. I wish to ask but a single question.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. Harris, of Virginia.) The five minutes of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Hill] has expired.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not know that I can make myself heard in the buzz that is going on around me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend until order is restored in the Hall. [After a pause.] The gentleman will now proceed.

Mr. REAGAN. I cannot properly discuss a bill like this in five minutes. I wish only to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to a single point of view in which it may be considered. It has been suggested in argument here by two or three gentlemen that men who either participated in the rebellion, as it is termed, or sympathized with it ought not to receive pensions for the services which they rendered the country in the war of 1812. It would seem that the question is looked upon by those who take that view with reference only to what they suppose was an offense against the Government.

It does not seem to be remembered that the people all over this country are contributing their share of the taxes which support the Government; are contributing their share of the taxes which pay some twenty-nine or thirty million dollars to the soldiers of the last war, the war between the States; that they are contributing their full share to all the expenses of this Government, and are liable to render their services with other citizens in the performance of any duty which may be required of them by the authority of the Government. Now, while they are contributing to pay the pensions of the soldiers at whose hands they suffered defeat, (and they do so without a murmur,) they now ask only that the soldiers of the war of 1812—I believe the bill covers also the invalid and wounded soldiers of the war with Mexico—that the southern soldiers of these two wars with foreign governments may be placed upon the pensionrolls of the country, just as the same soldiers in the States of the North and West are placed.

Is that wrong? If they are required to pay these expenses, if they have rendered services to their country in the hour of her trial, and have now grown old; if these States are restored to the Union, and if these old soldiers are restored to the rights of citizenship, if the object of this Congress is to renew fraternity and good-will throughrender their services with other citizens in the performance of any object of this Congress is to renew fraternity and good-will through-out the land, if the object of Congress is to be just as well as gener-ous, if we wish to stimulate patriotic attachment to the Government and devotion to it, are we to say to these old men, now from eighty to ninety years of age, tottering into their grave, who remember the services they rendered to their country in the hour of her trial, when confronting the armies of the first power of the earth—shall we say to them, "You shall not receive pensions; true, you were too old to participate in the recent war between the States, but you are tainted by living in the South, or by having had sons or grandsons in that war with whom you sympathized?" Will you forget that the States are restored to their original relations to the Union; that these men are restored to their rights of citizenship? Will you forget the great necessity that towers above all others, of restoring good-will and kindness and generous sympathy with and support of the Government, and a determination to support it in its revenues and defend it ment, and a determination to support it in its revenues and defend it in all its wars? Is there statesmanship, is there justice, is there generosity in asking those States and those people to contribute to these expenses, when you refuse a paltry sum of a few thousand dollars a year to pension men, now between eighty and ninety years of age, for services which they rendered before I was born, and before nearly every member on this floor was born? At this time, in view of the

That acts of Congress in violation of the Constitution are absolutely void is an undeniable proposition. It does not, however, consist with respect and forbearance due from a confederate State toward the General Government to fly to open resistance upon every infraction of the Constitution. The mode and the energy of the opposition should always conform to the nature of the violation, the intention of its anthors, the extent of the injury inflicted, the determination manifested to persist in it, and the danger of delay. But in cases of deliberate, dangerous, and palpable infractions of the Constitution affecting the sovereignty of a State and liberties of the people, it is not only the right but the duty of such a State to interpose its authority for their protection in the manner best calculated to secure that end. When emergencies occur which are either beyond the reach of the judicial tribunals or too pressing to admit of the delay incident to their forms, States which have no common umpire must be their own judges and execute their own decisions.

sentiment which pervades the American Union, North and South, East and West, in favor of a restoration of good-will and brotherly love, and a generous support of this Government, its institutions, its honor, and its flag, I cannot think that upon deliberate judgment such a view will prevail in this Hall.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Chairman, it was foreign to my purpose to enter into this discussion until a moment since. I have nothing to add to what has already been said, and so well said, by so many gentlemen on this floor who have advocated this measure. But, sir, I have risen for the purpose of saying that I cannot for my life see what partisan politics has to do with this question. I sat here to-day and listened with regret to gentlemen of the republican party, one or two at least, who must needs lug into this debate reminiscences and memories connected with the late war. And, sir, I must say that it was with morwho must needs hig into this debate reminiscences and memories connected with the late war. And, sir, I must say that it was with mortification that I heard a distinguished gentleman on this side of the House make political allusions which in my judgment are not calculated to promote harmony in this House or throughout the country. What has secession to do with this question? Secession is dead. It no longer lives in the mind of any man in the Southern States. There is not a man to be found who advocates the doctrine. Then why should it he havest the located is this House et all?

is not a man to be found who advocates the doctrine. Then why should it be brought up here and discussed in this House at all? Why should it be paraded upon this floor? Why should my distinguished friend from Georgia [Mr. HILL] flaunt it in the faces of northern members of this House by reference to any sectional historic events which have long since transpired? There is no necessity for any such thing. And I, for one, claiming to be as good a southern man as the gentleman from Georgia, or any other southern man, protest here and now against the introduction of such questions into this Hall, especially upon a subject like this, which appeals to the sympathies and better nature subject like this, which appeals to the sympathies and better nature of every gentleman.

I shall not pretend to argue the question whether these pensions are a debt or not. I care not whether they are a debt. I suppose that other gentlemen, like myself, do not care whether they are regarded as a debt or not. Sir, they are something higher than a commercial debt. This appeal is made to the better natures and sympathies of representatives of the people Morethan that, the appeal is made to those high patriotic principles which cause every government to regard and care for its defenders. Upon that ground I would vote for these pensions, if I represented the State of Maine or any other State north of Mason and Dixon's line. north of Mason and Dixon's line.

Mr. HUNTON. I move that the committee rise. I do this for the purpose of moving in the House to terminate debate upon this secattack has been made on our section of the country, to which there has been no opportunity to reply.

Mr. HOLMAN. As an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] I move that the pending bill be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and the War of 1812.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. HOAR. I rise to debate the motion. I suppose it is debatable. The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to submit the question; but he will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to say one word in regard to the historical question which has been raised by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] The Hartford convention, an assemblage of men as pure, as able, and as patriotic as ever lived upon the face of the earth, adopted the resolution—which I dare say the gentleman has quoted correctly able, and as patriotic as ever lived upon the face of the earth, adopted the resolution—which I dare say the gentleman has quoted correctly—in substance from the resolutions of the Virginia Legislature of the year 1798. When they declared that a State Legislature was to judge of the validity of an act of Congress, they never contemplated any right to resist that act by force. They held, as every man within the sound of my voice I will venture to say holds, that an unconstitutional act of Congress is of no validity, and that the citizen before obeying it has a right to try, by constitutional methods and remedies, whether it is valid.

Mr. HILL, Let us see whether that was their position. Their

Mr. HILL. Let us see whether that was their position. Their language is:

When emergencies occur, which are either beyond the reach of the judicial tribunals or too pressing to admit of the delay incident to their forms, States which have no common umpire must be their own judges and execute their own decisions.

Mr. HOAR. Undoubtedly. That is the Virginia resolution. Mr. HILL. No, sir; that is not quoted from the Virginia reso-

It is the Virginia resolution in substance.

Mr. TUCKER. That is not the language of the Virginia resolution. Mr. HILL. I admit that the Virginia resolution says practically the same thing.

Mr. STEVENSON. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEVENSON. I make the point of order that this discussion is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has decided already that it is in order, and the gentleman from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. HOAR. Every member of that convention, with one or two exceptions, declared they never contemplated or believed a State had the right to carry that question of judging of an act of Congress to the extent of forcibly resisting it.

Mr. HILL. That is just what they did.

Mr. HOAR. I deny it. I know something of the history of my section of country. On the contrary, the recommendation made by that convention, as a remedy which they suggested, was in the way of legislation by the Congress of the United States, which legislation was afterward adopted by Congress itself.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am a little tired for one of hearing these continual lectures from the other side of the House

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN rose.
Mr. TUCKER. I move by unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts be allowed to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has given the floor to the gentleman

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that the five-minute rule

MIR. CUNGER. I make the point of order that the five-minute rule cannot apply to the motion to recommit.

The CHAIRMAN. It was adopted by unanimous consent pending the discussion of this bill, and while this is being discussed without going out of committee, the Chair will hold that the five-minute rule, unless unanimous consent be granted, is still operating.

Mr. HOSKINS. I wish to say a word on the point of order.

Mr. HOSKINS. I wish to say a word on the point of order. Mr. HOAR. Does any gentleman object to my proceeding? The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to the gentleman from Massachusetts proceeding? Mr. HOLMAN. I do not insist upon taking the floor, and do not hear any objection to the gentleman from Massachusetts going on. The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection. Mr. HOAR. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am a little tired of these lectures coming from the gentleman from Georgia, whom the other side of the House seem to treat as their organ on the subject of good feeling and desire for reconciliation which they think ought to prevail in this Congress. Why, Mr. Chairman, it happened that a proposition was made the other day to extend the amnesty and grace of the people of the United States to a class of persons who had for of the people of the United States to a class of persons who had forfeited their right to hold office under the Government by treason. Under any other country on the face of the earth that class of persons would have been gibbeted and hung in chains. None of them having received any punishment, it was suggested to except a single case, the case of a person who did not desire himself to be included within the proposition of pardon, who scoffed and sneered and spurned at the clemency of his country; who it was believed had been guilty, not merely of the crime of treason, but of a military crime detestable and detected accomplished for the crime of treason, but of a military crime detestable and detested everywhere of interfering with the generosity of his own people and inflicting cruelty and horror upon defenseless pris-oners such as the annals of the civilized world do not know elsewhere.

Now, it strikes me that if gentlemen on the other side of the House have come back to exercise the functions of this Government, as American citizens they would say "Let us see whether that be true. If it be true that this man does not want our pardon, if it be true that he has done these acts which are charged upon him, then the honor of this country, North and South alike, is concerned in excluding him from the exalted privilege of American citizenship." Instead of that inquiry being made in that spirit, in jealous care for the honor of our countrymen North and South alike, a gentleman who does not remember whether or not he introduced in the confederate congress a proposition to hang up as spies and without trial every congress a proposition to hang up as spies and without trial every northern soldier who could be taken upon their soil, comes in here—

Mr. HILL. Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman allow me?

Certainly

Mr. HILL. In the first place no such resolution was ever offered by anybody or heard of as that he now quotes. The resolution, as I explained on the occasion referred to, simply alluded to pretended soldiers soldiers.

Mr. HOAR. And to negroes.

Mr. HILL. Just stop. It simply applied to those who attempted to incite insurrection. I wish to say now—

Mr. HUNTON. I rise to a question of order. I wish to inquire whether this debate is germane to the question before the committee?

Mr. HILL. Let me first answer the geutleman's question. It is this, that I did not recollect the resolution because of any disposition to evade any responsibility about it. The gentleman will understand I cannot have an accommodating memory. When I do not remember a thing I say it, and I said this then most emphatically, that very likely I did introduce the resolution. It was likely I did. I did not remember whether I did or not; I was inclined to think another gentleman was the author of it; but whether that was so I did not know. tleman was the author of it; but whether that was so I did not know. I understood its object was within the laws of war, as it simply in-

Mr. HOAR. I hold the resolution in my hand and it is this—
Mr. HILL. Pretended soldiers.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.
Mr. FOSTER. How can it have expired when he is going on by unanimous consent?

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I make the point of order that this debate is all out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that when under the five-minute rule the time of the gentleman was extended by unanimous consent, the Chair considered that as implying that the extension was for five minutes. The five minutes have expired.

Mr. CASWELL was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. HOAR.

Mr. HOAR. This is the resolution:

That every person pretending to be a soldier or officer of the United States-

Mr. HILL. Does that apply to every prisoner?
Mr. HOAR. It applies to every "soldier or officer of the United

Mr. HILL. The language is:

Every person pretending to be.

Mr. HOAR.

Who shall be captured on the soil of the Confederate States after the 1st of January, 1863, shall be presumed to have entered the territory of the Confederate States with intent to excite insurrection and to abet murder, and that, unless satisfactory proof be adduced to the contrary before the military court before which his trial shall be had, he shall suffer death.

The next is:

That all commissioned officers in the command of said Benjamin F. Butler be declared not entitled to be considered as soldiers engaged in honorable warfare, but as robbers and criminals deserving death.

Now the gentleman from Georgia, whether he remembers those reslutions or whether he does not, is not the man who should stand up here and tell the members of this House in this centennial year that we had broken every oath we ever took upon our lips, applying that charge to an entire section.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? That thing has been repeated frequently. I will say with all deference to the gentleman, and not meaning to be offensive, that there is not a word of truth in it. The language which I used, and which has been repeated over and over, I did not apply to the whole republican party, but to that wing of the party which taught there was a higher law in this country for the regulation of political conduct than the Constitution of the country. Mr. HOAR. The gentleman stood there shaking his head and his

Mr. HILL. O, no.
Mr. HOAR. And said you have broken every oath. I appeal to the memory of this House if it was not so. And I ask what was it that induced the gentleman to strike out of the RECORD those sen-

Mr. HILL. They were not stricken out; that sentence was not stricken out or altered. I know exactly what words I changed. Mr. HOAR. Now, Mr. Chairman, when this question of the honor and the magnanimity of this Government, in which the North and South were alike concerned, was before the House, another gentleman on the other side of the House, not representing a southern constituency, called out in his place, in language which it is hardly decorous to repeat, that an honored and distinguished member of this House was a "hyena." And although that utterance excited the disgust of the civilized world this country and Europe as it went over the the civilized world, this country and Europe, as it went over the telegraph wires wherever telegraphic communication extends, the gentlemen on the other side of the House seized the first opportunity to put the author of that utterance (also suppressed in the RECORD) into the Speaker's chair as their representative of the order, the dignity, and the decency of the American Congress.

Now, Mr. Chairman, for one I am tired of hearing these lectures. When those efforts were made to abolish slavery the men who were When those efforts were made to abolish slavery the men who were endeavoring to wipe out that blot from the character of the American people were assailed as we are assailed to-day by the representatives of the opinions which have sent the gentleman from Georgia to this floor; and now they stand here and say and confess that during that struggle we were all right and they were all wrong. They thank God that the North, that the abolitionist, that the fanatic, that the republican of the North had his way; that the shackles were stricken from four millions of slaves, and that they did not have their way. I think that in the light of that history they may learn a little mod-I think that in the light of that history they may learn a little modesty. Are you not glad that history they may learn a little modesty. Are you not glad that when you and your predecessors were clamoring at us in this way we persevered and put down American slavery? Are you not glad—

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to know by what right the gentleman from Massachusetts is occupying the floor. A MEMBER. O, give him rope enough.

Mr. RANDALL. Let him go on; he is the exponent of the Hartford convention.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to finish this one sentence. Are you not glad that the rebellion was put down against your efforts? Is not the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] glad that the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution, which abolished slavery, passed, in spite of his struggles by filibustering and by vote to prevent the Congress coming to a vote upon that question, and in spite of his own recorded nav?

Now, Mr. Chairman, when gentlemen come here to confess the glory, to share in the fruits, to exult in the results of the republican legislation in this country, I should think that at least a little modesty should induce them to discontinue the old lectures and to forget the old jargon.

Mr. COX. I was sitting very contentedly in my seat until the poisoned arrows of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] were hurled against me personally. I am sure the honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] has not delegated the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] to speak for him in regard to any personal grievances arising from remarks for which perhaps I am properly sorry. I do not think the gentleman from Maine will call upon the gentlemen from Massachusetts to take up his cause or his quarrel. If he does, all the worse for Maine. [Laughter.]

When I used the language which the gentleman from Massachusetts said was infamous, I did it under a provocation which perhaps no one knows except the gentleman from Maine and myself. I did it without much deliberation, but no one questioned it, unless perhaps I myself at the time questioned the propriety of it as a parliamentary pungency. My idea at that time was this; and, since it has run over the country in lyric song and all sort of vituperation, I may as well state it:

At the beginning of the war, knowing that I had no power as a humble member to stop it in the least, I did my best to assuage its severities. I introduced here the first joint resolution as to prisoners. One of the regiments which I helped to raise in Ohio had been captured and was at Libby prison. The cartel was not carried out. We all know the reason of that. It was not being carried out at that time, but I obtained from Mr. Lincoln special exchanges; but during the whole of the war I gave my time and trouble and all I could give as a member of Congress for the relief of prisoners.

When the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] the other day (my friend of so many years' standing) would not allow me the small privilege of correcting my record as to prisoners, of which his reading and ilege of correcting my record as to prisoners, of which his reading and interpretation were wrong, and when I had yielded to him so many times during the preceding debate, I had no other epithet to hurl at him except that which was unparliamentary; that epithet which the gentleman from Massachusetts has again revived, digging again out of the grave that which has already been covered.

But, Mr. Chairman, I will not go into that. I have no special controversy with the gentleman from Maine or the gentleman from Massachusetts. The gentleman from Massachusetts comes forward here as a defender of the Hartford convention and the "old blue-light Federalists" who hung out their signals to the British.

O, no, they did not take any active part to carry out their session.

Read the history of the Connecticut shore and you will know how it Read the history of the Connecticut shore and you will know how it was that the Federals lost power for so many years and why the democratic party under Mr. Madison kept power so long. They did not do anything to carry out their heresy, but they were in constant sympathy with the enemy; I do not mean all New England; but was there not a Governer Strong of Massachusetts † I believe there was, and he issued an order that the troops of Massachusetts should not go out of the State, did not he? I think he did. [Laughter.] And yet this gentleman from Massachusetts, in order to hurl reproaches on the democratic side, forgot all that bad history of his State, and then to clinch it all without provocation begins a personal assault then, to clinch it all without provocation, begins a personal assault upon me. Now let us come back and see the meaning of this debate. There is a class of men in this House who are philanthropists and humanitarians, who believe that-

Whether on the scaffold high Or in the battle's van, The fittest place where man can die Is where he dies for man!

[Laughter.]
They do not believe in practical affairs, and when we come to prac-

They do not believe in practical affairs, and when we come to practical business measures they cannot keep their hands off these old, unpleasant records; they dig down into the grave constantly. No; I withdraw that remark. They go after old reminiscences that were well forgotten this centennial year.

Now, two years ago I had the pleasure to hear General Butler make a speech for the old soldiers. He told the House how he had given back his sword in New Orleans to one of Jackson's old officers. General Butler favored the bill to restore these soldiers of 1812 to their remisions and as General Butler was considered by some people a lead pensions, and as General Butler was considered by some people a bad pensions, and as General Butler was considered by some people a bad man, and if he is a bad man, what are you? [Laughter.] I did not think General Butler was a bad man on that subject; he gave us a lesson and your side of the House a lesson; but now, when we are ready to do it, the cry will go out everywhere that we are for retrenchment and promised to cut down the expenses, and yet will add $10,000,000 to the pensions of the soldiers, and add $500,000 to pay the arrearages. You will hear the cry go all over the country that she democratic party, that pays secession soldiers, refused, perhaps, back pay for the Union soldiers which will come in pretty soon to back pay for the Union soldiers, which will come in pretty soon to the tune of $50,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, I think the best thing to do with this bill, which has friends on both sides who are in favor of retrenchment and economy and of fair dealing with the soldiers, would be to have the bill re-committed for this purpose. I understand that the Senate caucus has already said that they will not put upon the pension-rolls sol-diers of the war of 1812 for their pensions during the war, so that if we were to pass such a provision in this House bill the old soldiers will get no benefit from it because of the action of the Senate. If, then, we are to give these old soldiers anything, let us pass such a bill as that the Senate may receive it and pass it. And I hope that the committee, if the bill is recommitted, will report it back allowing pensions to commence at the end of the war, in 1865, and that the arrears of pensions that accrued during the civil strife will not be incorporated in it.

Mr. BLAND. The committee simply reported on this subject as the last Congress did, and we hoped that it would pass this House.

Mr. KASSON. But it has been amended.

Mr. BLAND. It was reported from the committee in the same form as the bill of last year.

Mr. COX. I hope that portion of the House that favors retrenchment cox. I hope that portion of the roots that ravors retrierement especially, when the people are not in a condition to pay large sums which are gratuities, will consent to strike out that portion of the bill. It is something like running up an old store bill while you are sick, which you do not like to pay when you are convalescent, an old store bill that we do not care to mortgage on enough to pay when we have to give the children of our families bread and clothing and education. We are in distress and our industries are in trouble this year. Perhaps we can afford to begin operations at the end of the year. And hereafter, when we are in full health, when our energies are fully restored, we can, if it be not too late, revert to the soldiers of 1812 and do full justice by them. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to move that the committee now rise and make to the House the recommendation he has indicated.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the committee now rise and report this bill back to the House with a recommendation that it be recom-mitted to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and the War of

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the committee rose, and Mr. Randall having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. Blackburn reported that the Committee of the Whole, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1605) amending the laws granting pensions to soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and their widows, and had instructed him to report the same back to the House, with the pending amendments, and recommend that it be recommitted to the Committee on Revolutionary

Mr. HUNTON. I ask that the committee have leave to report this

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. HARALSON. I ask that the committee be instructed to consider and report the following provision to be added to the bill:

Provided, That the surviving colored soldiers, or their wives and minor children, of the war of 1812 shall be entitled to the benefits provided by this act.

Those gentlemen who have all made good speeches here, urging the restoration of good will on all sides, I am certain will not object to this amendment

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Will the House recommit this bill to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and the War of 1812? And the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Hunton] asks that the committee be granted leave to report it back at any time. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the bill was accordingly recommitted, with leave to the committee to report it back at any time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sympson, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 810) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, and requested concurrence, in bills and a joint resolution of the following

A bill (S. No. 84) extending the time for the redemption of lands held by the United States under the several acts levying direct taxes, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 446) for the relief of Daniel Stickney, of Presque Isle, Maine; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 5) authorizing First Lieutenant Henry Metcalfe, of the Ordnance Department United States Army, to accept a decoration from the Sultan of Turkey.

UNPUBLISHED HISTORICAL DOCUMENTS.

Mr. HOAR, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved. That the Committee on the Library be directed to inquire and report what unpublished documents, correspondence, or other manuscripts relative to the history of the country before March 4, 1789, are now in the possession of the Department of State, and the historical value of the same, and the expediency and cost of publishing the same in full, or of publishing a catalogue and abstract thereof; also to inquire and report as to the expediency and cost of publishing the Monroe papers now in the possession of said Department.

Mr. HOAR moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ISSUE OF SILVER COIN.

Mr. LUTTRELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Resolved. That, in the opinion of this House, the Secretary of the Treasury should commence at once to issue the silver coin which has accumulated in the Treasury in substitution of the fractional currency, as provided in the first section of the act approved January 14, 1873, providing for the resumption of specie payments,

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1328) to amend the act entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved March 3, 1875; and

An act (H. R. No. 1590) to remedy an error in eurollment and find the same truly enrolled.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House now adjourn. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Before submitting that motion, the Chair will submit to the House certain requests of members now lying upon his desk.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. Hoge was granted leave of absence for ten days. Mr. NEAL was granted leave of absence for one week.
Mr. CABELL was granted leave of absence for five days.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. KING asked, and obtained, leave to have withdrawn from the files of the House papers in the case of J. W. Huston upon which no action had been taken.

Mr. FRYE asked, and obtained, leave for Mr. Ingalls B. Andrews to withdraw from the files of the House his petition and papers, there having been no adverse report thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. There are several gentlemen who desire to introduce bills for reference to their appropriate committees to which I suppose there will be no objection. For that purpose I will withdraw my motion that the House do now adjourn.

R. P. WILSON.

Mr. HOOKER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2428) for the relief of R. P. Wilson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be

REBECCA A. FOLKES.

Mr. HOOKER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2429) for the relief of Rebecca A. Folkes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT AUBURN, NEW YORK.

Mr. MacDOUGALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2430) authorizing the construction of a court-house and post-office at Auburn, New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

J. A. THOMPSON.

Mr. PAGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2431) for the relief of J. A. Thompson, of California; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-HOUSE IN BOSTON HARBOR.

Mr. FROST, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2432) to appropriate money for the erection of a light-house and fog-signal on "The Graves," at the entrance of Boston Harbor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

REPEAL OF RESUMPTION ACT.

Mr. OLIVER. I hold in my hand the petition of 300 citizens of Council Bluffs, Iowa, praying the repeal of the act for the resumption of specie payments. I ask that the petition, which is brief, be read and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The petition was read, as follows:

The petition was read, as follows:

We, the undersigned, citizens of Council Bluffs, Iowa, and the vicinity, petition your honorable body and request that so much of the act of Congress approved January 14, 1875, as provides for the payment of United States legal-tender notes in coin upon the 1st day of January, 1879, and so much of the said act as authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to sell and dispose of the bonds of the United States for the purpose of enabling him to redeem such legal-tender notes, be immediately repealed. We are not in favor of inflation, but believe that the enforcement of the resumption clause of said act not only has proved but will prove disastrous to the material, commercial, and financial business of the country.

The netition was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The petition was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now renew the motion that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 1, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BOGY. I desire to make a personal explanation, with the permission of the Senate.

On looking over the remarks which were made by me the day before yesterday, while the bill for the annual appropriation for West Point was pending, I think it is possible I may have done the graduates of that institution an injustice. At all events, it is so thought by some of those gentlemen. Such was not my intention. But as my words may not have been what I intended them to be, I will now take this occasion to explain that I know of my own knowledge that the academy at West Point has for a great many years furnished many eminent men who have served the country for many years in different branches of the Government with ability, and I will say with great fidelity. Many of those men have passed away, and it was not my intention to cast any reflection upon them.

Again, during the late war many of the graduates of West Point attained very great distinction, and performed valuable and meritorious services; many of them gave their lives on the field of battle; many of them are now living, some in the service of their country yet, and others not. And, as the war is over, I will say more, that the graduates of West Point distinguished themselves on both sides. It was, therefore, not my intention to convey the idea to the country, as it is thought by some is conveyed by the few remarks that I made, that that institution had not turned out any eminent men. I only made a comparison—I will not dwell on that now—between that, as I consider, very expensive institution and others.

In conclusion, I will only say, and it affords me great pleasure to say, that there are many eminent men now living who are members of the Army to-day who are graduates of West Point—men whose names will live in history; and it was not my intention to cast any reflection upon them whatsoever.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BOGY presented a memorial of the Missouri State Board of Horticulture, in relation to the invasion of grasshoppers, which during the last season reduced to starvation many thousands of the inhabitants of the Western States and Territories, and especially of Minnesota, Nebraska, and Kansas, and in favor of adding to the Department of Agriculture a scientific division, under the control of men whose learning and fitness for the position are acknowledged both at home and abroad, to be named by the National Academy of Science; and the appointment of a commission of five persons, to wit, three entomologists, one chemist, and one botanist, to be chosen by the National Academy of Science and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, to investigate the causes which affect injuriously agricultural interests and to suggest the best means of diminishing the losses; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 99) for the relief of Daniel Brown and James Robinson, proposing to pay them an amount of money equal to one-fourth of the net proceeds of one hundred and twenty-six bales of cotton discovered by them, have had the same under consideration, and instructed me to report it back and recommend its indefinite postponement.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WADLEIGH, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Annie Wallingford, praying for remuneration for property alleged to have been taken by the Army of the United States during the late war, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAPERTON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of William Mason, of Taunton, Massachusetts, praying compensation for the abrogation of his contract to manufacture 100,000 muskets of the Springfield pattern, submitted an adverse

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 23) for the relief of Edwin Fairfax Gray, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, from the Committee on Agriculture, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 158) to provide for an investigation as to the habits of the Rocky Mountain locusts, or so-called grasshoppers, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed grasshoppers, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 438) for the protection of agriculture against injurious insects, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1677) to correct a mistake in and amend section 1375 of the Revised Statutes, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws of the United States; which was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT NASHVILLE.

Mr. COOPER. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2285) au-

Ings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. K. No. 225) authorizing the purchase of additional grounds for the custom-house at Nashville, Tennessee, to report it back without amendment, and with a recommendation that it pass. I ask for its present consideration. By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded $\frac{t}{0}$ consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to apply so much of the money heretofore appropriated for a custom-house, court-house, and post-office at Nashville, Tennessee, but however receiving $\frac{t}{2} \frac{t}{2} \frac{t}{ not, however, exceeding $18,500, for the purchase of the ground situated in that city, and lying between the western boundary line of the present custom-house lot and Spruce street, fronting one hundred and present custom-house lot and Spruce street, fronting one hundred and sixty-five feet on Broad street, and running back the same distance to an alley, or such part thereof as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary, if, in his judgment, the public interests require additional land for the building; with a proviso that the amount heretofore fixed by law as the cost of the building shall be reduced to the extent of the sum that shall be applied in the purchase of the additional ground.

Mr. SARGENT. I wish to ask one question in reference to that bill. I should like to know whether the site has already been selected, and what effect this will have upon the cost?

Mr. COOPER. None; they have not commenced the building yet.

Mr. SARGENT. Is it proposed to modify the plan so that it shall cost less

Mr. COOPER. I have a letter from the officer in charge, and that is what he says.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Isaac Strohm, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of

A bill (H. R. No. 2286) to further provide for the building of a custom-house, post-office, court-room, &c., in the City of Memphis, Tennessee; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 77) providing for the restoration of the original Declaration of Independence.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution directing the Committee on the Library to inquire and report what unpublished documents, correspondence, or other manufactures of the restoration before March 4, 1780. scripts relating to the history of the country before March 4, 1789, now in the possession of the Department of State, and the historical value of the same, and the expediency and cost of publishing the

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 1328) to amend the act entitled "An act to enable and (H. R. No. 1585) to amend the act entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government and for the admission of said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved March 3, 1875;

A bill (H. R. No. 1590) to remedy an error in enrollment; and A bill (S. No. 160) for the relief of S. K. Thompson.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SAINT LOUIS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2270) to provide for the purchase of material and for the continuation of the work on the building for custom-house and post-office at Saint Louis, Missouri, have had the same under consideration, and directed me to report it without amendment. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It empowers the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department to contract for the iron columns and pilasters of the first story and for the rolled-iron beams of the second story of the United States post-office and custom-house at Saint Louis, Missouri, and appropriates $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the propriates $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the payment of the contract, payable out of the appropriation for the building to be made for the next fiscal year. The Architect may, in his discretion, use such portion of the sum thus appropriated for labor and material as may be absolutely necessary for the proper preservation and progress of the building.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Perhaps I ought to say a word in relation to this bill. It does not require any appropriation out of the Treasury, but proposes to take the amount out of the appropriations which may be made for the post-office at Saint Louis the coming season: but it is deemed year important to have authority to contract for son; but it is deemed very important to have authority to contract for the iron columns and pilasters and beams in advance, as it takes some two or three months to obtain these after the contracts shall have been made. Therefore, if this work is to go on this season and the working season is to be used, it is rather important that the architect shall be empowered to make these contracts at the present time.

Mr. WEST. It is very true, as the Senator says, that this does not involve any appropriation immediately; but it certainly does pledge the faith of the United States, and upon that faith authorizes the Supervising Architect of the Treasury to make a contract which will eventually require an appropriation. To neither of these propositions do I take any exception; but I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there are leaking in here—this is the third one I have heard to-day; first, in the proposition reported by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. Cooper,] to which there could be no objection; next, in a bill received from the House of Representatives, and third now, this one—there are leaking here propositions that legitimately belong to the appropriation for public buildings and grounds under the reg-ular appropriation bill. So the Senate will bear in mind that whatever apparent economy may occur in that bill at large when it is presented will in some degree be owing to the fact that we have appropriated in driblets what it is customary to appropriate at large. If the appropriation bill for public buildings and grounds should therefore be diminished, we must understand that it is diminished by these amounts which we are constantly appropriating.

I did not rise to make any objection to the bill, but to call attention

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will merely say, in response to the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. West,] that I believe the policy has been on the part of the Senate for some years to confine these bills to individual buildings, and that they should be passed upon here according to their merits, and that the old system of twenty years ago of putting them all in one appropriation bill has been abandoned here, and so far as I am concerned I am very glad to see that the House of Representatives are adopting the same principle and let every tab Representatives are adopting the same principle and let every tub stand on its own bottom.

This bill, it strikes me, is eminently proper. It cannot be supposed that we have built the Saint Louis post-office up one story and propose to abandon it; and therefore, if the building is to be completed at all, these iron columns and girders will be required. I have a letter from the Supervising Architect that goes more fully into an explanation of the subject; and, if any Senator desires to hear more upon the subject, I will have the letter read.

Mr. SARGENT. I am in favor of the passage of this bill. At the time the original bill passed and several times since we made the original appropriation for Saint Louis I was therefully convinced on the appropriation for Saint Louis, I was thoroughly convinced on the evidence presented that the Government of the United States needed the building, and that it ought to be erected at the earliest possible moment. Therefore I do not wish to say a word to prevent the pasmoment. Therefore I do not wish to say a word to prevent the passage of this bill, but I should like to remark that the subject which we remit to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds by the new departure to which the Senator from Vermont alludes, is the question whether a building shall be built or not; but all appropriations for the buildings, and especially for the continuation of the work, are made under the auspices of the Committee on Appropriations. That was the invariable usage, both in the House and Senate, until this session, when a new rule seems to have been adopted.

Mr. CONKLING. There we objection to make to this bill because

Mr. CONKLING. I have no objection to make to this bill because I am bound to suppose it is necessary that this or an equivalent bill should take effect. But if I understood the Senator from Vermont aright, he said that this bill made no appropriation. Perhaps he added "now." If he did, I can see that his remark was technically There will be other bills of this sort, one or two in cases of which I have personal knowledge; and my purpose is at this moment to see that no distinction is accepted by the Senate between this bill and any other bill making an appropriation for such a purpose. The bill, if I can read it, does appropriate $75,000, directing to be sure that it shall be paid out of the appropriation to be made for the next fiscal year; but in respect of imposing an obligation upon the Treasury, in respect of devoting the money to this use, in respect of rendering it certain that the amount required is to be paid to this use, it is an appropriation to all intents and purposes

As I said before, I make no objection to this bill because I assume it is a necessary and proper bill; but when other bills shall come in other cases, I should not like to have them encountered by saying we have passed no appropriation bills in this regard." form of words, a mere matter of book-keeping, possibly a matter of date when the entries take place upon the books. But this is a devotion by law of a sum of money there needed to this purpose, and as much in my judgment substantially an appropriation bill as it could much in my judgment substantially an appropriation bill as it could possibly be in any form which might be given to it.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I think this is simply an act carrying out a previous act by which an appropriation was made to erect this building. It is not, therefore, so far as the bill is concerned, in my judgment at all material whether it passes now or whether you shall wait and make the appropriation in the general appropriation bill, were it not for a fact which I think has not yet been stated to the Senate, and which, as I view it, renders it highly important that this bill should pass and should pass now. It is only one giving to this bill should pass, and should pass now. It is only one giving to the Government the power to make contracts to carry out in fact an existing law, and the Senator from Vermont has specified what these contracts are to be for, the iron-work, which takes time. Now, the additional fact which has not been stated is this, that the other material is now waiting, and has been waiting for a long time to be used, and could be used to-day; and if this beam contract had been made mouths ago, you would have had there not a building of one story to-day, but a building very nearly completed. It therefore furthers or delays the construction of the building by just so much as you pass this bill or neglect to pass it and trust it to an appropriation bill. It changes not a dollar the final appropriation the one way or the other; but it is highly desirable that it should pass now, so that this other work may be done, so that the other material now ready, and which has been ready to go into the building, may be put into it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There is only one reason I can conceive of why this bill should pass; and that is, that by our law as it now exists in regard to appropriations no contract can be made for an expenditure beyond the actual appropriation applicable to the specific case. We have made appropriations for the erection of a court-house, or a post-office, or whatever the building is, at Saint Louis, and we shall probably continue to make those appropriations until the building is completed; but in order to make progress with the work they need to anticipate an appropriation, or at any rate they need to make a contract, which, as the law is at present, they cannot do. The Dea contract, which, as the law is at present, they cannot do. The Department is prohibited from making any contract in advance of an appropriation. This bill therefore is simply to authorize a contract to be made, with a pledge in the bill that we will make an appropriation of $75,000 to complete the contract thus authorized. That is the effect of the bill. The object evidently is to obviate the difficulty which arises under the law which declares that no contract shall be made except with reference to a specific appropriation; otherwise it would be just as well to say that they were authorized to make a contract without making a pledge of $75,000.

Mr. WEST. I think that the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in submitting this bill to the Senate gave sufficient and adequate reasons for its passage. He has been aided sufficient and adequate reasons for its passage. He has been aided by both the Senators from Maine, and I am quite assured that the Senate feels disposed to vote for the bill; certainly it will have my vote. But I rose, in the first instance, to call the attention of the Senate to a subject that should not be ignored; and the chairman on Public Buildings and Grounds asserts here that it has not been the practice of the Senate or of Congress to appropriate for these buildings in a general appropriation bill. I contend that it has; I shall manifest that it has; and I call the attention of the Senate again to the fact, not that the functions of the Committee on Appropriations are being encroached upon, but that we are by these special bills appropriating money that will go to diminish the amount that will included in the general appropriation bill, and somebody will claim credit for it.

When the Senator says it has not been our practice, I will simply refer to the act of last session in which twenty-two particular buildings were specifically appropriated for altogether in one bill, the sundry civil service bill, and this very custom-house at Saint Louis got $700,000. It seems that that $700,000 is not enough for the present fiscal year, but $75,000 more is actually needed. I do not dissent to that; but I again call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we are by these leakages appropriating money that will not appear in the general appropriation bills, and there may be some claim for economy on that account. The proposition of the Senator from Vermont is not substantiated by the quotation I have made; in fact it is denied. It is not a matter of any consequence any further than that we are taking a new departure, as the Senator from California says. Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, it is not my desire and never has been to enlarge the jurisdiction of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Prior to my service upon the committee it was the practice of the Senate to charge that committee only with the buildings and grounds here in the District of Columbia; but soon after my entry upon the service-whether upon a vote of the Senate I am not sure, but I think it was by a vote of the Senate—all questions in relation to public buildings and grounds throughout the United States were consigned to that committee; and it has been the practice, so far as I know, that all questions in relation to public buildings and grounds are first referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Thus the Committee on Appropriations has acquired jurisdiction by recommendations coming from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in relation to these buildings all over the country

It is a fact that bills come from the other House with a large number of these appropriations in them, and have for a long time; but I believe that, so far as the practice of the Senate is concerned for the last eight or nine years, it has universally been the custom to refer all these questions in the first instance to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and they have made the report and asked frequently for the Committee on Appropriations to consider such matters as they approved of. Of course when a bill comes here from the House of Representatives with these appropriations, in the sundry civil bill, they do not go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, there is one general reason why it seems to me this bill ought not now to pass. There are many public buildings in the country in the condition of the custom-house at Saint Louis, undertaken, in progress, no appropriations for the prosecution of the work, and certainly none adequate to the completion of the buildings. If we begin now to make appropriations for particular buildings, one of two things will inevitably happen: either that we go on and make corresponding appropriations for all these buildings in various parts of the country, or otherwise it will happen that some buildings, by being selected out under articular circumstances, will be prosecuted and others equally necessary for the business of the country will be neglected. I am not disposed to favor this bill now. When we have before us the policy of Congress in regard to the buildings that have been undertaken, and are not completed, and can understand exactly what is to be done in each particular case, and understand the magnitude of the appropriations to be made to this branch of the public service, then I shall be as willing to do something for the prosecution of this building at Saint Louis as for any other; but I am not willing now to do anything for any public building until we know what the policy is to be and the magnitude of the appropriations that are to be made.

This particular bill is objectionable in two respects: First, it takes the Saint Louis custom-house out from the general rule, which is that no public officer shall make a contract binding the Government in excess of appropriations already made. That is a wise provision of law, the only provision by which Congress can hold its public servants to the proper performance of their duties. By this bill we are to authorize the Supervising Architect of the Treasury to make contracts in excess of appropriations, and without making an appropriation adequate probably to the contracts which he is authorized to tion adequate probably to the contracts which he is authorized to make. Secondly, under the proviso he is authorized to take every dollar of the $75,000 which in the text of the bill is appropriated to the purchase of iron pillars and pilasters for the first story, and iron pillars for the second, and apply it to the preservation and progress of the work; which means that, if he chooses, he goes on with the work, expends the $75,000, makes contracts for the pilasters and pillars for the first story and pillars for the second story, and not one dollar of the $75,000 may be applied to the fulfillment of those contracts

I object to the bill upon general grounds, and I object to the bill on the specific features which it contains.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It seems to me that the objections of the Senator from Massachusetts are wholly untenable. It is true that this bill virtually makes an appropriation of $75,000, but it is to come out of the regular annual appropriation that may be made this come out of the regular annual appropriation that may be made this year for this building.

Mr. BOUTWELL and Mr. WEST. Suppose we do not make any?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I take it that the United States are not about to abandon a public building in Saint Louis or any where else, where they have raised it up to the first story. I think we are not bankrupt, and I think the common sense of Congress in both branches will secure an appropriation such as may be absolutely

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts objects to the proviso; he objects to the preservation of this building so far as it has been constructed or to any part of this $75,000 being appropriated to the further progress of the building. Obviously some portion of this money would be required to be expended in labor to take care of these columns and of these girders and other portions of the building, but whatever amount may be expended is hereafter to be deducted from the amount in the regular annual appropriation bill. So that we are not to make this appropriation as an expenditure for any deficit that now exists or that will hereafter exist. It is to be merely anticipatory of the action of Congress, in order to enable contracts to be made for these articles that will require from two to three months to obtain them whenever

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has expressed so much better than I can the thought that was in my mind on this subject that I will not attempt to repeat it; but I wish to say that, if what we hear of the necessity of economy is correct, the passage of this bill now seems to me of very doubtful propriety. I think, if we are compelled—and I am not sure but that we are—to economize to the extent insisted on here and elsewhere, there is no better place to begin than upon the public buildings of the country. If we are unable to carry on the internal improvements of the country that are necessary for its prosperity and welfare, if we are compelled to cut down the pay of twelve-hundred-dollar clerks who have received that sum for the last thirty or forty years—I do not know how long—I think that these fine, and I may say extravagant, buildings may be suspended for at least a year until we recover from the semi-condition of bankruptcy which is represented here. I do not believe that, however, Mr. President. I do not believe this Government is bankrupt or that it is on the verge of bankruptcy. I do believe, however, that the statements which we have heard made here for the last two or three years, the wail of despair that has gone up from this and the other end of the Capitol over the financial condition of the country other end of the Capitol over the mancial condition of the country and its near approach to bankruptcy, have done more to bring it there than perhaps anything else. But until the question is settled as to what we are to do about these various improvements, I think we should not put one case ahead of another. I think I shall vote in favor of this proposition at the proper time, but it does seem to me that this is not the proper time. When the sundry civil bill shall be presented to the Senate the whole question will be submitted, and we can then decide upon a full consideration of that question whether can then decide upon a full consideration of that question whether we shall make appropriations for the continuance of these buildings or not. I am inclined to think that I shall vote to appropriate money for their continuance and completion, but I do not wish to commence that now on a single case, to be taken out of the general principle which is to govern all the other cases.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I should be very sorry indeed to see a stop put to this brilding, because I think it is false economy to prevent such appropriations as will take care of the buildings now started. As I understand this bill, it is an appropriation to furnish the material necessary to carry on the work this summer.

No man in private life, having expended a part of the money necessary to build a house or a barn, would refuse to finish it because at the moment he feared there was some embarrassment around him. He would rather say, "because times are hard," to use a common word, "materials are therefore cheap, labor is cheap, and now is the time to continue these buildings which have been begun." I would begin no new buildings; I would make no appropriation that looked to new expenditures for this object in the future; but I would finish every public building that has been commenced, because that would be true economy. It would not be prudent to economize by refusing appropriations where the result would be to waste property now in existence. These materials will be furnished by the town of Saint Louis. Nextto Philadelphia, Saint Louis is becoming the greatest manufacturing town in the United States. They have not only the raw material in great abundance in that great State of Missouri, but they have in the town of Saint Louis some of the best mechanics and artisans that the country affords. They are out of employment, and they will do the work much cheaper now than they will after awhile.

I say, therefore, let us appropriate this sum now, and save much money by spending a little at the present time. I am not in favor, to use a common expression, of saving at the spigot and letting the liquor run out at the bung-hole.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BOGY. I hope it will not be committed. I trust it will be disposed of at once one way or the other. It is a just measure, and should pass now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 15, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boutwell, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christianey, Conkling, Conver, Hamilton, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morton, Patterson, West, Windom, and Wright—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dorsey, English. Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Key, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Sargent, and Withers—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bruce, Burnside, Clayton, Cragin, Dawes, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Logan, McDonald, Maxey, Norwood, Paddock, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sharon, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, and Whyte—29.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and

Mr. BOUTWELL subsequently submitted a motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill; and the motion was entered.

FIFTEENTH-STREET FRONT OF TREASURY.

Mr. MORTON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution in regard to the admission of Mr. Pinchback as a member of this body.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has not expired.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to inquire and report how much more land on Fifteenth street will be required when the east front of the Treasury building is completed, and what would be the probable cost of the same, whether obtained at private sale or by condemnation for public use.

I have not any expectation that there will be any action of Congress on this subject at the present time; but nevertheless it is one of sufficient importance to call attention to it. It is apparent to all that when the Treasury building shall be completed we shall require from something like sixty to one hundred feet more of ground on the east front, and at the present moment a considerable number of the buildings are being taken down on Fifteenth street. It would seem to be a matter of economy—it certainly would be in the case of a private individual whose interests were at stake—to take measures to buy this ground before very expensive buildings shall be erected thereon. understand that a very large hotel is to be constructed directly in front of the Treasury building. I suppose that no person who has ever examined the subject at all will hesitate to say that there ought to be something like sixty, seventy-five, or more feet of ground added to that front in order to complete it according to the plans upon all the other sides of the building.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The east front on Fifteenth street. It could be obtained now, I suppose, without being compelled to pay for this extensive building that will be put up there in the course of the present season. I merely ask for the passage of this resolution in order to obtain the information from the Secretary of the Treasury. The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 22%) to further provide for the building of a custom-house, post-office, court-room, &c., in the city of Memphis, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 77) providing for the restoration of the original Declaration of Independence, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

UNPUBLISHED HISTORICAL DOCUMENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Committee on the Library be directed to inquire and report what unpublished documents, correspondence, or other manuscripts relative to the history of the country, before March 4, 1789, are now in the possession of the Department of State, and the historical value of the same, and the expediency and cost of publishing the same in full, or of publishing a catalogue and abstract thereof; also to inquire and report as to the expediency and cost of publishing the Monroe papers now in the possession of said Department.

REGISTERS IN BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE offered the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire and report whether any person is now exercising the office of register in bankruptey in any judicial district which does not embrace all or part of the congressional district for which he was nominated by the Chief Justice of the United States.

E. RUMSEY WING.

Mr. McCREERY. I give notice that to-morrow, after the morning business is through, I shall call up the bill (S. No. 382) to appropriate $1,000 to remove the remains of Hon. E. Rumsey Wing, late minister to Ecuador, from Quito to the cemetery at Louisville, Kentucky.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill (S. No. 60) declaring the true intent and meaning of the Union Pacific railroad acts, approved July 1, 1862, July 2, 1864, and July 3, 1866, and for other

Mr. MORTON. I move to postpone all other business to take up the resolution in regard to the admission of Mr. Pinchback.

Mr. WRIGHT. I called up yesterday the bill just laid before the Senate by the Chair, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. I expected this morning to ask the Senate to proceed with its consideration. I understand the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] is eration. I understand the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] is ready to proceed with what is commonly known as the Pinchback case. My friend the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Alcorn] is ready to proceed with his remarks upon that resolution. I have no wish to antagonize the Senator from Indiana; indeed, I appreciate the importance, and in fact the necessity, of disposing of that case at the earliest day possible. I will, therefore, not insist upon proceeding with this bill this morning; but I wish to state now, as I have the floor, that if the bill shall not be passed over informally, allowing the Senate to proceed with the Pinchback case, but if it shall be laid aside by a vote of the Senate, I shall ask the attention of the Senate to it as soon as the Pinchback case is disposed of. I trust the Senate will understand that I shall ask the attention of the Senate to this bill as soon as the Pinchback case is disposed of. bill as soon as the Pinchback case is disposed of.

the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Indiana will not call up the case of Pinchback this morning. There are one or two Senators absent, particularly the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. Whyte,] who has been here and is detained to-day by the extreme illness of his wife. He will probably be here to-morrow. If the Senator would agree to let the case go over until to-morrow, it would be an act of kindness to him and a courtesy which I am sure he would appreciate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 26, noes 17.
Mr. STEVENSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

the roll.

Mr. HOWE, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] I should vote for this motion, and he would vote against it if he were here.

Mr. NORWOOD, (when Mr. GORDON'S name was called.) I am informed that my colleague [Mr. GORDON] who is absent is paired on this question with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. CLAYTON.]

Mr. WRIGHT, (when his name was called.) When the question shall arise upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] and also upon the main question. I am paired mont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] and also upon the main question, I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Dawes,] but the understanding was that upon any motion that might be presented to bring the question before the Senate, or anything preceding a vote upon the amendment or the main resolution, I was to vote as if he was present. I therefore cast my vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. PENNIS.] He was to have been back, by our arrangement, last night; but he is not present; and it is but due to the courtesy which belongs to this body that the pair should extend a little longer. If he were present, I should have voted "yea" and he would have voted "nay" on this motion.

The result was announced-yeas 32, nays 24; as follows:

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 24; as follows:
YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry, Frelinghnysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Jones of Novada, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Robertson, Sargent, Sharon, Sherman, Spencer, West, Windom, and Wright—32.
NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, English, Goldthwaite, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Merrimon, Norwood, Paddock, Randolph, Ransom, Stevenson, Thurman, and Withers—24.
ABSENT—Messrs. Booth, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Christiancy, Clayton, Dawes, Dennis, Edmunds, Gordon, Howe, Maxey, Morrill of Maine, Saulsbury, Wadleigh, Wallace, and Whyte—17.

So the motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. Morron on the 5th of March, 1875:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback be admitted as a Senator from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years, beginning the 4th day of March, 1873.

The pending question being on the amendment of Mr. EDMUNDS to insert the word "not" before the word "admitted."
Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, at the time this question passed from the consideration of the Senate, I had not concluded the remarks which I was making. I had taken the floor at that time under the impression that no other Senator desired to speak, and that I was to conclude the debate; but I have learned since that that is not the fact, and therefore I shall yield the floor at present, having no anxiety to speak.

Mr. ALCORN. Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States declares that no State without its consent shall be deprived of its equal representation in the Senate of the United States. That the State of ouisiana has been for more than three years, without her consent, Louisiana has been for more than three years, without her consent, deprived of her equal representation in the Senate of the United States, I presume none will controvert. That there is a violation of the Constitution; that there is a violation of the right that belongs to the State of Louisiana, is a question that I need not discuss. Whether the fault lies with the people of that State, or whether it rests with the executive branch of the Government, or whether it lies with Consgress, are questions on which men will differ; but the fact remains, nevertheless, that Louisiana has for over three years been denied her full representation in this body. In laying down the law for the adfull representation in this body. In laying down the law for the admission of Senators, section 18 of chapter 1 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides that-

It shall be the duty of the executive of the State from which any Senator has been chosen to certify his election under the seal of the State to the President of the Senate of the United States.

Section 19 provides that-

The certificate mentioned in the preceding section shall be countersigned by the ecretary of state of the State.

The certificate so issued is called the credentials, which each Senator who presents himself for admission into this body must have in his possession. They are his title-papers to the office. They are just as much an evidence of his title to a seat in the Senate as is a patent evidence of a title to a piece of land. You may go behind the patent, it is true, as you may go behind the credentials that are presented by the Senator; but the credentials are prima facie evidence, and entitle him to admission to his seat in this body. This rule has been adhered to by the Senate, with some exceptions, since the foundation of the Government. It is true that during the period of the revolution, when the Southern States were not represented and when some of the border States were suspected of rebellious sentiments, the Sender States were suspected of rebellious sentiments, the Sender States were suspected of the southern sentiments and increased in the sentiments of ate of the United States assumed an arbitrary and inquisitorial position, and, before admitting the Senator, passed upon the question of tion, and, before admitting the Senator, passed upon the question of his fitness, his qualification, his right regarding the interest of the Union, to a seat in this body. But, outside of war issues, it has been generally held that where the credentials where presented in due form of law the Senator was entitled to take his seat on his prima facie case. Upon what title does each and every Senator hold his position in this body? Is there a Senator who holds his seat upon any other claim or title than that of an election by the Legislature of his State, certified to under the seal of the State from which he comes? In other words are not the credentials of each and every Senator upon other words, are not the credentials of each and every Senator upon this floor the only evidence which that Senator possesses of a title to his seat? The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Merrimon] responds, "There might be others;" but I ask whether there is any other? Is there a Senator on this floor who has shown any other title to his is there a senator on this floor who has shown any other title to his seat than the credentials which the law provides he shall have? What right then has a Senator who holds by the title prescribed by law to declare here in his place that another claiming a seat in this body who is equally supported by the certificate of the governor in conformity with the law shall not be received? What right has the Senator from North Carolina to question the admission of another Senator to a seat upon a prima facie case in this body, showing, as he does, title-papers equal in form and substance to those presented by the Senator from North Carolina when he presented himself to be sworn in as a member of this body?

Suppose to-day each and every seat in this body should be vacated, the governors of the different States under the law would issue certificates of election or give credentials of appointment to persons to fill this body, and each and every Senator should come here with his credentials; would any one Senator have a right to say to another, "You shall not be sworn in?" Has any Senator here the right to call in question the formality of the election of any other Senator on this floor? The only question that would arise would be as to the credentials, Are they in due form of law? And, if in due form of law, the Senator has a right to present himself and be sworn in. After he is sworn in, the credentials, the prima facie evidence of title of the Senator may be investigated. After that is investigated, after the Senate has assumed jurisdiction of the case, after it has assumed jurisdiction of the person of the Senator, and not until that time, it can act. The State that accredits a Senator to this body under the certificate of its governor in conformity to law has a right to demand his admission upon the prima facie cree, and this body has no legal power to inquire into the right of the Senator until it has assumed jurisdiction of the credentials and of the person. Then the Senator, if challenged, is put upon his trial here to respond to any objection that may be urged against the legality of his election or against his fitness as a member of this body, with the right to come before the committee to which the question may be referred and there answer to all objections that may be made to him.

Now, upon what state of facts was it that the Senate of the United States undertook the investigation of the Louisiana case? Was it for the purpose of ascertaining the character of the Legislature that elected Pinchback or any other person in that State? It was not; but what made it a necessity for the Senate to investigate the collateral question of Ray's credentials or of the credentials of McMillen or any other person that was elected by the numerous legislatures that have existed within the last three years in that State? It was that have existed within the last three years in that State? It was for the reason that there were two persons who claimed to be governor of Louisiana, and each of these functionaries had certified under the great seal of the State the election of a particular individual to a seat in this body. The Senate of the United States could not decide prima facie as to who was governor; they had no judicial knowledge of the fact. It was a question that the Senate had to decide after investigation, and for itself. The Senate undertook the investigation of the question for the purpose of ascertaining who was governor of Louisiana; and having investigated that question had the Senate Lonisiana; and having investigated that question had the Senate come to a conclusion as to who was governor of Louisiana, that would have settled the case in favor of that claimant who held title under the certificate of the ascertained governor of Louisiana.

plications involved in that election have become well known to the American people. Perhaps no question has been discussed more thoroughly in this body than the Louisiana case. In no case of any thoroughly in this body than the Louisiana case. In no case of any election in any country, perhaps, have there been evidences of fraud overreaching that which was shown to have existed in the election in the State of Louisiana in 1872. Warmoth was the governor of that State at that time; Kellogg, who was then a member of this body, returned to his State and became a candidate for governor. Warmoth, whose support was supposed to be equal to twenty thousand votes in the State on account of the fact that he was governor, formed a coalition with the Greeley party in Louisiana, whereby it was agreed that McEnery should be elected governor with Warmoth's assistance, and after his election as governor Warmoth was to be elected between Kellogg and Warmoth; they being the chief actors in the contest. While the results involved the peace and prosperity of Louisiana, it is charged by the enemies of the respective parties that the struggle was maintained upon purely selfish grounds.

The game was one that was suited to the capacity of both Kellogg and Warmoth. There was perhaps no villainy, no outrage that could be perpetrated on either side that was not perpetrated for the purpose of carrying that election. When the election had been had, Warmoth by operation of law was entitled to the returns. He placed them under lock and key and held them subject to the manipulation of his friends. The advantages were all in his hands. Kellogg and the returning board who were of the Kellogg party had no returns. Finding that they were not able to obtain any returns, they resorted Finding that they were not able to obtain any returns, they resorted to the very convenient expedient of securing affidavits going to show that Kellogg was elected. Each party claimed to have been elected. The returning boards of each of these parties gave the proper certificates to their respective friends. The Legislatures were commissioned, organized, assembled, and each of the Legislatures of McEnery and Kellogg alected two Senators to this body me for the mercined. and Kellogg elected two Senators to this body, one for the unexpired term of Kellogg, and one for the long term which is now claimed by Pinchback.

When the matter came here, upon the credentials of the parties applying for a seat in this body, each held the certificate of a person claiming to be governor of the State of Louisiana; each had the great seal of the State; each had the certificate of a secretary of state of the State certified to as provided by law. It was not as to who was elected Senator, but it was as to who was governor of Louisiana, that the Senate committee went forward to investigate. The Senate committee reported by a majority that no one was elected governor of the State of Louisiana; that the election was an organized fraud on both sides. They reported the fact that Kellogg's party had no re-turns and that the returns which were in the possession of Warmoth, and which had been made to declare the election of McEnery, had been manipulated, many of them having been forged.

The Senate, however, refused to adopt the report of that committee; and, so far as the report of the committee goes, it simply stands to-day with no higher authority than that of the report of a commit-

When the committee presented the report for adoption, with a bill to carry out the views expressed in the report, the Senate voted it down. This left the condition of things in Louisiana precisely, so far as the Senate was concerned, as the Senate found it. But the executive department of the Government of the United States had recognized Kellogg as governor of the State of Louisiana, and the Army was used to support that recognition; and the courts of the State of Louisiana had recognized Kellogg as governor of that State and held that the law under which he was inaugurated was constitutional. that the law under which he was inaugurated was constitutional. All the departments of the Government, aside from Congress itself, had recognized Kellogg as governor. He held the position of Governor. McEnery's legislature was finally dispersed, and he was driven from the field, and Kellogg was left in possession. Congress refused to do anything. Kellogg, in spite of all local opposition, maintained his government. His official position was recognized in the State of Louisiana. It became an accepted authority throughout the United States, so far as it could be, emanating from the governor of a State. Finally the House of Representatives at the last session. of a State. Finally the House of Representatives, at the last session of Congress, passed a formal resolution recognizing the Kellogg government. The Senate of the United States, subsequent to that time, passed a resolution to the same effect.

The members of the McEnery legislature, headed by McEnery himself, kept up a show of opposition to the Kellogg government. To quiet this condition of things and give peace to the country, members of Congress who had been sent to Louisiana to investigate the condition of affairs there proposed to the members of the rival legislatures a plan for an amicable adjustment of the differences between them. The returns were, under this arrangement, withdrawn from the State of Louisiana, and, after having been examined by Mr. Wheeler at his home in the State of New York, he submitted to the contestants a plan of compromise, which was finally adopted. Some members of the Kellogg Legislature were ejected and some members of the McEnery legislature were admitted. The compromise covered the recognition of the official acts of Kellogg up to that time and assumed the legality of the acts of the Kellogg Legislature; and the adherents of McEnery of the acts of the Kellogg Legislature, and the adherence of agreed that no question involving the right of Kellogg to the office of governor should thereafter be entertained by them. The people of governor should thereafter be entertained by them. The people of Louisiana generally acquiesced in this settlement, and to-day they profess their readiness to adhere to its conditions. The Legislature that elected Mr. Pinchback had submitted an amendment to the constitution of the State of Louisiana. The people of the State have since voted upon that amendment; it was accepted, and became part of the fundamental law.

I was one of the committee who believed that the election of 1872 I was one of the committee who believed that the election of 1872 in Louisiana was a fraud; who believed that neither Kellogg nor McEnery was elected governor of the State of Louisiana; who believed that, on account of the fraud that was apparent on the presentation of the case, it was impossible for anybody to ascertain with any correctness who was elected governor of Louisiana. But, sir, that question is not before the Senate now. When that question was presented to the Senate, and the Senate was asked to take the scalpel and cut this impurity out of the body-politic of Louisiana, the Senate refused to do it, but permitted Kellogg to remain in his place, sanctioned the government of Kellogg the action of the President sanctioned the government of Kellogg, the action of the President, the action of the courts, and maintained the government of the State of Louisiana.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. Thurman] the other day said, if I remember aright, that the Senators who had signed or supported the majority report which declared the frauds and the irregularities of the election in Louisiana were now stultifying or would stultify themselves should they vote to admit Mr. Pinchback to a seat in this body. Now, mark the distinction. The question of investigation before the Committee on Privileges and Elections was as to who was the governor of Louisiana, not as to who was the Senator. It is true that it was upon the application of the respective claimants to a seat in the Senate that the question as to who was governor came before us. The determination of that question would settle the dispute as to the title to a seat in this body between the claimants.

The Senator from Ohio, who is good authority in matters of law, when speaking in the Spencer case, made this remark:

The only doubt I have in my mind, and I state it frankly, because I will not do any injustice in this business, is this: whether the certificate of the governor does not make out, prima facie, that that legislative body which he certifies for was the true Legislature. That is the only serious difficulty there is in the whole case; whether or not, looking to the act of Congress, we are not bound to assume prima facie, that that body which the governor certifies is the Legislature until the content is a bour. trary is shown

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] upon that occasion

I admit that you can inquire into the authority of the appointing power, whether a man has been regularly and legally elected in the mode pointed out by the law. That you can do; but I deny, as was attempted to be done in the Goldhwaite case, that you can look into the character of the Legislature that elected him.

The Senator from Kentucky declared that you could not look into the character of the Legislature that elected in the Goldthwaite case.

Mr. STEVENSON. Certainly; I still insist that Congress cannot inquire into the elements that compose a State Legislature if the body be a legislature, because the constitution of every State makes the Legislature of the State the sole judge of the elections and returns of its own-members.

Mr. ALCORN. How then will you ascertain that a legislature is a legislature? If a body is maintaining and holding its position as a legislative assembly in a State, is passing laws and enforcing laws; if it is a body to which the people yield obedience, whose legislation is accepted as the law of the State, in the absence of any adjudication to the contrary, I ask whether that be not the Legislature of the State?

Mr. STEVENSON. The inquiry propounded by the Senator is abstract; still, in that form its solution is easy. The Legislature, and not Congress, inquires into and passes upon the returns, qualifications, and elections of the members composing it; but the question supposed has no application to the pending motion, for the reason that the Legislature of Louisiana, which professed to elect Pinchback in January, 1873, is conclusively shown by the report of the Committee on Elections not to have been a legal Legislature. By the facts found and conclusions reached by that committee the Legislature which elected Pinchback was not in law or in fact a Legislature, but a mere body of men who usurped power and were upheld in their usurpation by military power.

Mr. ALCORN. The remarks of the Senator which I have quoted are a sufficient reply to the position he now assumes. If the view taken and held by the Senator touching the powers of the Senate over this question is correct, what has the report of the committee to do with it? The Senator's language as I have quoted it is:

I admit that you can inquire into the authority of the appointing power, whether a man has been regularly and legally elected in the mode pointed out by the law. That you can do; but I deny, as was attempted to be done in the Goldthwaite case, that you can look into the character of the Legislature that elected him.

Mr. STEVENSON. Certainly.

Mr. ALCORN. And yet he says that he denies or disputes the character of the Legislature that elected Pinchback, because, forsooth, a committee of the Senate reported that the election was a fraud! committee of the Senate so reported to the Senate, which report was not adopted by the Senate; and yet the Senator, in the face of his own language, declares here that the report of that committee is sufficient authority for him to decide that the Legislature that elected Pinchback was no legislature at all!

Mr. STEVENSON. I am rather Mr. STEVENSON. I am rather astonished at the position of the Senator. I know that the Senate did not adopt the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections; but still I have never heard the facts stated in that report questioned; in which the Senator himself concurred, as a member of that committee. What facts were they? Why, that the Kellogg government was a fraud; that the Legislature which assumed to elect Ray and Pinchback was no legislature; that it was never elected by the people of Louisiana, but was a sham, created by the usurpation of Durell and his coadjutors. These facts were found by the Senator himself, concurred in by all his colleagues but one on the committee, and were reported to the Senator.

Mr. ALCORN. Certainly they were: but it is not true that the facts

Mr. ALCORN. Certainly they were; but it is not true that the facts stated in the majority report were not called in question. The chairman of the committee reported in favor of the Kellogg government, and he had many adherents in this body. The courts of Louisiana, I may add, certainly sustained that view.

Mr. STEVENSON. Now the Senator insists that, because the Conexclusive power to judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its members, this power admitted by me in my former argument to exist confers upon the Senate the right to inquire into the election, returns, and qualifications of members of the State Legislature. I utterly deny the existence of this latter power of the Senate of the United States to inquire into the qualifications of members regularly elected to a State Legislature. The Senator from Mississippi argues that the Senate of the United States cannot reject a Senator presenting his credentials who was elected by a body of men that never were elected as legislators of a State; which fact was found by a standing committee of the Senate and concurred in by the Senator himself.

Mr. ALCORN. If the views of the Senator from Mississippi had been made the law of the case, the argument would be good.

Mr. STEVENSON. Does the mere circumstance that what the Committee on Privileges and Elections reported as an uncontradicted fact of the non-existence of a valid government in Louisiana or a valid Legislature in that State was not adopted by the Senate of the United States change the truth of facts so reported? And if these facts be true, are they not conclusive of the prima facie title of Pinchback? Mr. ALCORN. The Senator is a lawyer. I may hold a position with regard to a particular statute; I may argue with all the earnestness of an honest man that that statute is unconstitutional and void; but the courts of the country overrule my opinion upon that particular subject, and lay down the law precisely to the contrary of what I have believed and argued. The argument of the Senator from Kentucky would go to lay down the rule that because I had argued against the constitutionality of the law I should be denied the protection which in a subsequent action I might see proper to claim under its provisions. And until there is an adjudication that Kellogg's legislature was void and of no binding force, it stands the Legislature of the State under all the forms that have ever been required for the enactment of law. Because I held that the election of Kellogg was a fraud, shall my opinions be maintained as legal, as authority, and as binding upon any one, in face of the fact that all of the adjudications that had been made in every department of the Government from that time to the present have held that his election was legal and binding?

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question ust there?

Mr. ALCORN. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. With the indulgence of the Senator, it seems to me the point made by the Senator from Kentucky is this: that in the Goldthwaite case it was the fundamental law that you could not inquire into the elements of a legislature; but that in the Pinchback case the effect of a report made by a majority of the committee in an inquiry to which Pinchback was not a party, though never adopted, changes the fundamental law in the Pinchback case so that you can inquire into the elements of the Legislature. That is it precisely.

Mr. STEVENSON. O, Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana is very acute and ingenious, as he always is, especially when he has a bad case; but no Senator better than he knows the distinction between the constitutional power of a State legislature to judge of the validity of the election, qualifications, and returns of its own members, and the power of the Senate of the United States under a similar constitutional power to inquire, on the presentation of the credentials of a Senator whether the body which elected him was in law or in fact a legislature at all, whether the election was conducted acgrding to the act of Congress, and if either fact is made to appear,

should not be admitted

We have been officially informed by a standing committee of the Senate that the body which elected Pinchback was not the Legislature of Louisiana elected by the people. None other can elect a Senator. Does the fact that the Senate of the United States did not adopt the resolution ordering a new election in Louisiana, appended to that report, invalidate in any degree the facts stated in that report and found by the committee to be true? The Senator from Mississippi seeks to escape from the conclusions of fact found by the comsippi seeks to escape from the conclusions of fact found by the committee and himself, that at the time of the alleged election of Pinchback there was not a valid government in Louisiana by the non-action of the Senate. He likens it to an earnest legal argument made before the court upon the construction of a statute, but which is overruled by the court. He inquires whether for an error in his construction he is to be denied in some future action the protection of that statute? By no means. The illustration cited by the Senator has recorded by the senator that the following the senator is the senator of the senator of the senator is the senator of the senato has no parallel here. I am referring to the conclusiveness of the facts found in this report, not on its legal effect. Suppose the Senator to be engaged in the trial of some action in a court of law which after an adverse ruling by the court and a final trial was taken to a higher court and reversed. Would not the facts proved and set out in a bill of exceptions, without other testimony, be conclusive in another trial? My point is that the facts stated in that report are conclusive on the non-existence of both a valid government or a valid legislature in Louisiana in January, 1873. The recognition of Kellogg as governor de facto by the President of the United States at a subsequent period cannot impart legal existence to a State government established against the consent of the people of Louisiana by force and violence; still less can any such recognition by the executive of any body of men claiming to be a legislature, but which were never elected by the people, but were ordained and created by usurped judicial power against their consent, impart validity to their election of a United States Senator. If this be not true, then the President and not the people of Louisiana would dictate Senators for Louisiana. Whenever the fact of such usurpation is made officially to appear by testimony taken by a committee and reported to the Senate as having occurred in any State, then the Senate should and must act upon such proof by denying the person thus chosen a seat in this Chamber. The fact that the Senate did not adopt the report cannot militate against the truth of the facts stated in it. They conclude Pinchback and every

Mr. ALCORN. I hold precisely the views to-day that I held when signed the report to which the Senator alludes; and yet I hold I signed the report to which the Senator alludes; and yet I hold that this knowledge possessed by myself is not to affect me when I sit upon a jury to try a case at bar. That proof is not before this body at this time. Pinchback was no party to the investigation that was had by the Senate; but waiving that technicality and agreeing that he was there, the Senate refused, I repeat, to adopt the report of the committee. The Senate chose to ignore the report of that committee to recognize Yellegges the report of that committee to recognize Kellogg as the governor of Louisiana, and to warrant and to give credence to all his official acts. The Senator from Kentucky I infer holds that Kellogg is a usurper in his place as governor. Supse there was a requisition sent to Kentucky by Kellogg, governor of the State of Louisiana, signing himself as such, to arrest a fugitive from justice who had escaped into the State of Kentucky, would the Senator from Kentucky, who is an able lawyer, sue out a writ of habeas corpus before any judge in the State of Kentucky, alleging that habeas corpus before any judge in the State of Kentucky, alleging that Kellogg was not governor of Louisiana, with any hope of maintaining his suit? Would not the fact of Kellogg's certificate as governor of Louisiana preclude him from any such action as that before any judge in Kentucky? Then if Kellogg's certificate is good before a judge in Kentucky in a case involving the liberty of the citizen, I ask whether Kellogg's certificate is not good to-day in a primia facic case going to show that a Senator had been elected a member of this body? Mr. STEVENSON. Does the Senator wish a reply to his question? Mr. ALCORN. Just as the Senator chooses. I ask the question, and he can reply to it.

Mr. STEVENSON. It will give me great pleasure to give the Sena-

Mr. ALCORN. All right.
Mr. STEVENSON. If this were a prima facie case, with no other fact appearing or intervening except the certificate of Kellogg as the governor of Louisiana, and no evidence of the character of the Legislature, I would not hesitate to admit the applicant on the presumption arising from the regularity of his credentials; but if, upon the other hand, the credentials of the applicant, with the governor's certificate and other accompanying papers, were referred to a Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate to inquire into and ascertain the validity of the State government and of the Legislature by whom the applicant had been elected, and said committee were to report, the applicant had been elected, and said committee were to report, then the application ceases to be a prima facie case, but has been considered and reported upon on its merits. In answer to the Senator, the difference between the Kentucky case he supposes and this case is that when these credentials of Pinchback and John Ray, both elected United States Senators for different terms by the same Legislature in January, 1873, were presented they were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections to inquire into all the facts and into the legality of the Louisiana State election. Mr. Ray, who was elected at the same time and by the same Legislature with Pinchback, went before that committee, cross-examined witnesses, went into the whole investigation of this case, and the facts reported by that committee, including the Senator from Mississippi himself with his colleagues on that committee, were that the body thus electing Ray and Pinchback was not a valid legislature of Louisiana and had never been elected by the people. If it helps the gentleman any, let me tell him that the Senate did take judicial action on that report, and did concur in its facts by refusing to admit Ray. He presented credentials in all respects as regular as Pinchback, signed by Kellogg. Why was he rejected? Why was he not admitted upon his prima facie case? Why did the Senate acquiesce in the resolution of the Committee on Privileges and Elections declaring John Ray was not entitled to his seat? That they did so concur is proved by the fact that Ray was never admitted. That the Senate agreed with the committee in its conclusions of law and fact is clearly established by the fact that no motion was ever made to declare Ray entitled to his seat, and no action was ever proposed reversing this action of the committee. Ray, elected by the same body which elected Pinchback and on the same day, having credentials in all respects as regular, was never admitted, either on a prima facie title or a title on the merits.

Mr. ALCORN. The Senator from Kentucky is a lawyer; and does he attempt here to assume the position, even admitting his premises to be true, that Pinchback is bound by a trial to which he was not

Mr. STEVENSON. But I insist that he was a party. His credentials were here, and he was here then seeking action upon his creden-

Mr. ALCORN. His suit was not begun.

Mr. WEST. I will remind the Senator from Kentucky that the report was made on the 16th day of January, 1873, and Pinckback's credentials did not come here until after the 4th of March.

Mr. STEVENSON. I care not whether he was a party or not. He is bound, as every other citizen of Louisiana is, by a judicial investigation instituted in the Senate through its standing committee, which was directed to take proof, and ascertain and report whether the Legislature which elected Ray was a valid body. They reported that it was not, and Ray was excluded, or rather never was admitted. Pinchback was elected by that same Legislature. He was here and Pinchback was elected by that same Legislature. He was here and was often present at the investigation.

Mr. ALCORN. Certainly, he knew it was going on.

Mr. STEVENSON. And he knew that Ray, who was elected by the same Legislature which elected him, was attempting to establish its validity? He failed. The committee reported the fact that no valid legislature had elected Ray. That was a fact which bound every citizen. Do I understand the Senator from Mississippi to take the position that if the Senate has decided judicially that John Ray was not entitled to his seat hereause the holy which elected him was not not entitled to his seat because the body which elected him was not a legislature that such action does not conclude Pinchback?

Mr. ALCORN. The same Legislature having elected them both, and Ray having been upon his trial, and four Senators on the committee having reported adversely to the Kellogg government, the Senator from Kentucky gravely to-day asserts that that is an adjudication against Pinchback, who, forsooth, was in the city of Washington, who had been elected, and whose term was to begin about two months who had been elected, and whose term was to begin about two months after that investigation closed.

Mr. MORTON. The Ray case never came before the Senate.

Mr. ALCORN. I know it did not. I intended to notice that. The Senate did not pass upon Ray's case; but, failing to act on the question of who was governor, the term for which Ray was elected expired by limitation. The question was, I repeat, as to the governor of the State of Louisiana. Two parties claiming a seat here held certificates of election purporting to be from the governor of the State of Louisiana. One was signed by McEnery with the great seal of the State, certified to by the secretary of state; the other signed by the State, certified to by the secretary of state; the other signed by W. P. Kellogg, governor of the State of Louisiana, and certified to by the secretary of state of the State as provided by law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. ALCORN. Certainly. I am entirely good-natured and shall be very glad, because I am in search of truth, to yield to any Senator ho may see proper to controvert any position I assume.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should not rise to controvert any proposition of Mr. EDMUNDS. I should not rise to contain the the Senator from Mississippi. I have not the boldness to do that.

Mr. ALCORN. Ah! the Senator is very flattering.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely rose to ask him a question. He has stated that we ought not to be governed by the report declaring that there was no lawful government in the State of Louisiana when Ray and McMillen were elected Senators, because Pinchback was not a party to that inquiry. Now, then, would the Senator be willing to have these credentials recommitted to the Committee on Privileges and Elections with instructions to inquire (Pinchback being now before us as a party) whether he was elected by the lawful Legislature, and thus get at the facts?

Mr. ALCORN. I will answer my honorable friend that I would not be willing to have that done. If he had listened to the position which I assumed, I stated the fact that Pinchback was entitled to be admitted here upon his prima facie case. If the Senator from Vermont believes he was improperly elected, it is within his province to move to refer the credentials to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, when the Senate has jurisdiction of the case of the papers and of the person, and if then upon investigation you find that he is improperly here, the Senate has the power to turn him out. But he holds precisely the same writ of authority to a seat in the Senate that the honorable Senator from Vermont holds; that is, a certificate from the governor of his State. The case is changed now from what it was in 1872. Then there were two persons claiming to be governor of Louisiana; now but one person claims to be governor of that State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has Mr. Pinchback been elected since there was

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has Mr. Pinchback been elected since there was only one person claiming to be governor?

Mr. ALCORN. If he has not been elected since, the Legislature that did elect him has been indorsed, the governor who certified to his election has been declared by this body to be the governor of Louisiana, he has been recognized by the President, he is recognized to day by the courts of the country. He was recognized by the House of Representatives, and I re-assert he has been recognized by the Senate, and when recognized by the Senate, that recognition declared his title to the office to be good from the time of his inauguration. He has held his office for over three years, and his official authority has been acquiesced in by the people of the State of Louisiana. His official character was recognized and accredited by the present House official character was recognized and accredited by the present House of Representatives when it assembled in December upon a direct issue presented touching the credentials of Mr. Morey, whose seat was contested by a gentleman holding a certificate of election signed by Mc-Enery. The House recognized Kellogg's certificate, and held that Mc-Enery had no standing before Congress which entitled him to be heard. When Kellogg's certificate was called in question in the House, it was there admitted by that body that Kellogg's certificate entitled the holder on his prima facie case to be sworn in as a member of that body. body

Mr. EDMUNDS. The point, if I understand it then, is that Pinch-back has become Senator by lapse of time; that he has grown into it, instead of having been elected into it, in the first place.

Mr. ALCORN. I understand that Pinchback has become entitled to his seat for the reason that every person who disputed his authority and title to that seat has disappeared, that there is no person to-day controverting his right, and that he holds his certificate of election in due form of law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then he takes the seat because it is vacant?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then he takes the seat because it is vacant?

Mr. ALCORN. He takes the seat, if he takes it at all, because he has the title to it. I undertake to say another thing, that every adjudication, including an adjudication participated in by the Senator from Vermont, has been in favor of the Kellogg government, going to establish his authority and his right to act as governor of the to establish his authority and his right to act as governor of the State of Louisiana. Pinchback bears in his hand to-day his credentials, his title papers, certified to by the governor of the State of Louisiana, whom the Senator from Vermont has formally recognized. There is no one to dispute the authority of this governor. There is no one to dispute Pinchback's right to his seat here. McMillen has disappeared, and all contestants for the place have given way.

To fortify what I said with regard to the House of Representatives I read from the RECORD. Mr. BLAINE made some remarks at the time that the objection was made to swearing in Mr. MOREY, and called time that the objection was made to swearing in Mr. Morey, and called attention to the fact that at the second session of the Forty-third Congress the Kellogg government had been officially recognized by the House of Representatives, and, in addition to this, that a compromise had been entered into in the State of Louisiana whereby the people of that State had recognized Kellogg as governor, and that he having been recognized as governor by the people of the State of Louisiana his authority as such could not now be disputed.

Mr. Blaine then propounded some interrogatories, to which Mr. Lamar replied as follows:

The gentleman from Maine has addressed to me a series of interrogations upon this subject, all of which I will answer if I can remember them. So far as I myself am concerned—I believe he has referred to my own knowledge of the matter—I will answer him cheerfully: for, with reference to the Louisian contest and the compromise to which the gentleman alludes, I am perfectly willing te disclose both my relation to it and my understanding of its effect and obligation. That compromise did involve, in my opinion, the recognition of Mr. Kellogg as acting governor of that State. I think such was the spirit of that compromise when it was brought into this House. I admired the course of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and expressed my gratification at the fidelity with which he had brought the matter here. But, sir, when he appealed to me for my support I told him I could not vote for it, because, occupying my position, I could not give a vote which involved the recognition of Kellogg as governor. But in point of fact, sir, that resolution did pass, and its avowed and understood object and meaning were what the gentleman from Maine ascribes to it, and I acknowledge it has been carried out by the other side faithfully.

Mr. Morey was thereupon sworn in as a member of the House of Representatives, bearing in his hands the credentials signed by W. P. Kellogg, governor of Louisiana. From the time that Kellogg was recognized as governor of the State of Louisiana by the House of Representatives, that body was estopped from denying his official authority; and, after he was recognized as governor by the Senate of the United States, certainly this body could not call in question his official acts. At the time that the question was raised, and when the investigation was made before the committee. Kellogg and when the investigation was made before the committee, Kellogg and when the investigation was made before the committee, Kellogg was not recognized in this body as governor. Ray was not entitled to his seat because of the fact that Kellogg's authority to give him his credentials was disputed. Until that question was settled no one was entitled to a seat. That question was not settled until after the period of Ray's term of service for which he was elected had expired. Pinchback, in the facetious language of the Senator from Vermont, then "grew" into his office, when the Senate recognized Kellogg as governor of the State of Louisiana. Then his certificate became binding upon this body. When the government of Louisiana was recognized ing upon this body. When the government of Louisiana was recognized by the country everywhere; when it was recognized by the people of Louisiana; when it was recognized by every department of the Gov-Louisiana; when it was recognized by every department of the Government, and when at last it was recognized by this department of government, the questions were cleared away. There must be some way of arriving at a conclusion of facts; there must be some way of settling questions of this kind. Suppose you refuse to admit Pinchback, how can any one coming here with proper authority ever be seated in this body? The Kellogg government has fastened itself upon the State of Louisiana; it has imbedded itself in the constitution of Louisiana; it has imbedded itself in the laws of Louisiana; it is there to-day. How can you ever reach here the means of cutting impurities out of the body-politic in Louisiana? The Senate ting impurities out of the body-politic in Louisiana? The Senate offered to a committee of the Senate the scalpel, and told it to go forward and cut these impurities out. I was one who urged the Senate ward and cut these impurities out. I was one who diget the Schate to do this, but the Senate refused.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. ALCORN. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I venture to suggest to the Senator in this connection that the present democratic house of representatives in Louisiana. have recognized Kellogg as governor by proposing to impeach him in that character under the constitution. Whatever we may say of the fraudulent and violent character of the impeachment and the bad faith involved in it, the proposition to impeach him as governor recognizes his official character.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But may I ask how that fact can be used as authority when Pinchback was not a party to that impeachment? How are we going to bring that in?

Mr. MORTON. I do not see that there is any pertinency in that

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think there is much pertinency myself

Mr. EDMUNDS. 1 do not that in any part of that branch of the case.

Mr. ALCORN. Pinchback holds his title-papers under the certification. The only question, I recate of the governor of Louisiana, Kellogg. The only question, I repeat again for the benefit of the Senator from Vermont, before this peat again for the benefit of the Senator from Vermont, before this body was the question as to who was governor of Louisiana, and it is the only question which has ever been decided by this body.

But the proposition that the Senator from Indiana assumed is strengthened by another. When they undertook in Louisiana to impeach Kellogg you will observe that they did not claim to have the authority to impeach him for any acts of his that were committed before April, 1875. They held that the compromise was binding upon them and that all Kellogg's official acts up to that time were legal and binding upon the people of the State of Louisiana, and that they could not go behind that compromise to impeach Kellogg. It was before this time that Kellogg had given the certificate to Pinchback, which the Legislature of Louisiana to-day says is among the legal acts of Kellogg that they cannot impeach or assail. I present that as a of Kellogg that they cannot impeach or assail. I present that as a logical deduction from the position assumed by the Legislature of Louisiana when undertaking to impeach Kellogg.

My friend from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] is not in his seat. I regret that he is not here, for I wanted to present to the Senate a unique speci-men of the logic whereby Pinchback is assailed, and whereby at the same time the principle is asserted that the Senate has no right to inquire same time the principle is asserted that the Senate has no right to inquire into the Legislature of a State. The Senator from Georgia, in a speech which he delivered before the Georgia Legislature not long since, took occasion to review the history of the country generally, and especially did he refer to certain questions pending before this body. He made certain statements in that speech which I desire to allude to. He says, speaking of certain resolutions introduced by the Senator from Indiana.

The other series of resolutions offered by the same Senator contemplates the appointment of a committee by the Senate to investigate the last popular election in the State of Mississippi. The Constitution of the United States says of Congress that each body shall be the judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of its own members. If, therefore, some one claiming an election from one of the Mississippi districts were knocking at the door of the House of Representatives for admission and fraud were charged, that body could investigate his election by the people. Senators are not elected by the popular vote. Under the Constitution they are chosen by the Legislatures of the States. What possible right, therefore, or glimmer of law is there upon which the Senate can proceed to investigate a popular election in Mississippi? Gentlemen of the General Assembly, the Senate could with the same propriety and just as legally investigate the right by which you hold your seats in this body or the charge of fraud in the last elections in the States of New York or Illinois.

The proposition is too absurd for argument But what matters it to Senator Morron that, to secure Mississippi's eight votes in the electoral college, he must fly in the face of all precedent, override the law, trample down the Constitution, overthrow local government, and endanger popular liberty in this country? What matters all this to him? Picture to yourself a Senator from one of the States of this Union standing in the highest legislative body known to the laws, and which under the form of his Government, by the Constitution he has sworn to support, is made the bulwark against an invasion of the rights of the States—picture, I say, this grave Senator standing in that august assemblage elamoring for a committee, upon whose report he may overthrow the popular government of one of the co-equal States of this Union. And then look at the gravity of his argument! The question before the body is this: Where is the law under which the Senator seek to demonstrate that the United States Senate has such a power? What are his arguments? They are these: The last election in Mississippi must and can lawfully be investigated, because you want in Georgia a constitutional convention and a dog law. [Laughter.]

The Senator from Georgia assumed that the Senate had no power to investigate the action of the Legislature of a State. He takes unmistakable ground by the side of the Senator from Kentucky upon that position. He corroborates the position assumed by the Senator Ohio; but the Senator from Georgia, in order to make the logic of his argument entirely complete, goes on now to the Pinchback case; and I wish to notice what he says upon that case:

But do you say these are things of the past, and that we must look to the future? No man is more ready than your speaker to turn his back upon all these horrid recollections, and no man looks with more intensity of anxiety to the day when this country shall be no longer under the domination of hate, and when the whole people from ocean to ocean shall be united, peaceful, hopeful, and happy. [Loud applause.] But what encouragement have we, if this Administration is to last, to hope for such a future? Suppose Mr. Morton passes his resolutions. That is the aim of that party to-day, and if it goes into power again upon the passions which they seek to inflame and the prejudices which they essay to create, they will not only pass those resolutions, but make the precedent set the fixed policy of this Government. To adopt such resolutions, and thus override State lines and the popular will, is tyranny. But what next?

This party majority in the Senate of the United States is trying to make a legislator out of Pinchback! Pinchback, sent from Louisiana by a body which by the judgment of their own committee had no legal existence.

By what right, according to his logic, did this committee undertake to declare that the body which elected Pinchback had no legal existence? He asserts that there is no power to inquire existing in the Senate, and yet here he asserts that Pinchback is not entitled to a seat, because, forsooth, a committee of this body declared that the Legislature which elected him was not properly elected. It is upon logic like this that Senators stand here and object that Pinchback should be sworn in. But let me read a little further from the speech of the Senator from Georgia:

It is said to be capable of proof that he was a convict. But suppose we should prove it? We should only commend him by that to the confidence of that party! [Laughter and applause.] If we could prove him a jail-bird, it would only be to say, "Here is a fit legislator for the southern people;" and in the estimation of that party panegyric would be exhausted did we call him a thief. [Laughter and cheers.] I presume they will seat him. I hope they will not.

I trust I shall be there, although I am now paired, to record my vote against him; to do more, to join with my brother democrats in entering upon the records of the country a solemn protest against this outrage upon decency, law, and the Constitution of the country.

The Constitution of the country! He had just declared that under the Constitution of the country the Senate had no power to investi-gate or call in question the character of the Legislature that elects a Senator; and yet he declared here, in the same speech and in the next paragraph, that it is a violation of the Constitution of the country to seat this man, because a committee of the Senate had declared that the Legislature which elected him was not properly organized.

The charge made here against Pinchback, as previously insinuated by my honorable friend from North Carolina, in which it was held that Pinehback has been a convict in the penitentiary, is one that elucidates or makes forcible the position which I assume with regard to the right of a Senator to come here upon his credentials, and be permitted to take his seat; otherwise, Senators who hold their seats upon no higher authority standing here together in a body, may cast imputation and slander upon a Senator who knocks for admission into putation and stander upon a Senator who knocks for admission into this body, while that Senator has no power to respond.

Mr. NORWOOD. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. ALCORN. Certainly.

Mr. NORWOOD. My colleague is not here; and I think it proper to state what is his position. I do not think the Senator from Mississippi has represented him fairly, but he has not misrepresented him intentionally of course. intentionally of course.

Mr. ALCORN. I only read what the Senator said. I can only judge of his meaning by his language. I read from his speech.

Mr. NORWOOD. He meant just this: He was talking about a resolution introduced by the Senator from Indiana to investigate the election in Mississippi where there is one body, and but one, and a recognized legislature at that. The Senator from Mississippi is now talking about a case where there were two bodies, each claiming to be a lawful legislature, there being two claimants to a seat in this body, are clearly by the control of the worked legislature was about a seat in this body. one elected by one of the pretended legislatures and the other elected by the other. Under that state of facts, it became an absolute necessity that this body should determine in the beginning in limine, whether there was a lawful legislature and which was the lawful legislature. That is the difference between the two cases.

If the Senator will pardon me one moment more, as he has stated If the Senator will pardon me one moment more, as he has stated the logic of my colleague on this question, I beg to state what I understand to be his. In 1873 the Senator from Mississippi said: "There is no lawful legislature in the State of Louisiana;" that is, as constituted by the election in 1872, there was no legal legislature that elected Mr. Pinchback, or Mr. Ray, or Mr. McMillen. He said that from nothing nothing can come; that it was a nullity—that it was an absurdity to call that body a legal legislature; and yet the logic of the Senator from Mississippi now is this: That the governor of that State having been recognized by the judiciary of the State, therefore that legislature, which was illegal in the beginning and has continued illegal from that time down, is a lawful body; that, because of some action of the other branch of Congress on some ground of policy, the governor of that State has been recognized as because of some action of the other branch of Congress on some ground of policy, the governor of that State has been recognized as the governor, of necessity, therefore, a body which was void from the beginning, and never had any legal existence, is now a legal body; and having been made the legal body since it legalizes an election which took place when that body was absolutely void by his own report to the Senate.

Mr. ALCORN. The Senator makes very free with the courtesy that I extended to him for explanation, and if his argument was as strong as the length of time he took to state it here, in taking advantage of

as the length of time he took to state it here, in taking advantage of the courtesies that I extended to him, it would do very well.

Mr. NORWOOD. I did not hear the Senator's last remark.

Mr. ALCORN. It did not amount to anything except to say that I did not propose when I permitted—

Mr. NORWOOD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) The Senator from Georgia appeals to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. ALCORN. I will reply to the Senator, and then I suppose it will not be necessary for him to say anything in response. I gave him the opportunity to explain for his friend. He undertakes here to explain what his friend the Senator from Georgia meant when he made a speech in Atlanta. I have simply read from the speech. I had not undertaken to construe anything the Senator from Georgia said, but I gave the language itself. It put the Senator in the attisaid, but I gave the language itself. It put the Senator in the attitude of having denied the authority of the Senate in one paragraph to investigate the condition of a legislature in a State, and in the next to assert that it had the power to do so. In one instance it was unconstitutional and an outrage to investigate an illegal election in Mississippi, as was proposed to be done by the Senator from Indiana, but it was entirely competent to do so in the State of Louisiana. The Senator from Georgia, the colleague of the Senator from whom I recited, rises and makes the case as "clear as mud." He says there were two legislatures in the State of Louisiana. Yes, there were two; but I presume one of them was the lawful Legislature. Why not? What is the legal Legislature? What is the lawful body? A body Mr. ALCORN. Does the Senator from Georgia take me to be a

Mr. ALCORN. Does the Senator from Georgia take me to be a judge here in this case, whose opinions are to govern his actions? Why did not the Senator take my counsel when I made that report? He stood here and voted to admit McMillen, if I remember aright.

Mr. NORWOOD. Why has the Senator changed his position since he made that report?

Mr. ALCORN. I simply changed my position in obedience to law; what every man should do.

Mr. NORWOOD. I ask the Senator what law has changed it?

Does he hold that we are bound here in our action by the decisions of the courts of Louisiana or by the action of the other branch of

Mr. ALCORN. Or by our own action. Go all the way through it. The question of Pinchback's credentials has never been investigated. The question investigated by this body was as to whether there was a governor in Louisiana, and, if so, who that governor was. A majority of the committee of this body, four of the members, reported that there was no government in Louisiana. But the Senate refused to adopt that report; and the Senate by its action reversed that report in that, that it recognized the government of Louisiana as it then existed and recognized Kellogg as the governor of that State. There is the adjudication, and by that adjudication I hold that I am bound;

and that is all of it.

Mr. NORWOOD. I wish to ask a question. I ask the Senator whether he did not, as a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, investigate the facts which were necessary to determine whether the Legislature that pretended to elect Mr. Pinchback was a lawful body, and whether he did not report that it was an unlawful body? I ask that in answer to his question as to whether Mr. Pinchback was a party to that investigation. If the Legislature that pretended to elect him was not a lawful body, what necessity was there for Mr. Pinchback to be a party to the investigation?

Mr. ALCORN. The Senator has heard me again and again assert and re-assert the fact that I did investigate that election in Louisiana as one of the members of the committee by whom it was investigated, and that my judgment, from which the Senator from Georgia dissented, was that there was no legal election held; that it was an organized fraud; and I say, if that is true, will the gentleman point me to some way out of the trouble? If my adjudication of that matter was correct, then there was no governor in Louisiana.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALCORN. Certainly.
Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator from Mississippi if the report which he has referred to did not distinctly declare that McEnery was not elected ?

Mr. ALCORN. Certainly it did.

Mr. MORTON. And if our democratic friends have not argued and voted, notwithstanding that report, that he was elected?

Mr. ALCORN. I just charged awhile ago that my friend from Georgia, notwithstanding the report, had voted to admit McMillen upon the idea that McEnery was elected governor, right in the face of the report of the committee.

more?
Mr. ALCORN. O, yes.
Mr. NORWOOD. I desire to ask the Senator to stick to the question.
The question is not whether there was a lawful governor, because the governor did not elect Mr. Pinchback; but whether there was a legislative body that was lawfully organized. He said that body was an organized fraud; and then I put the question to him, how an organized fraud can be legal or be a legal body. He turns to the question of the governorship and says that Mr. Kellogg has since been recognized as governor of the State. The question I desire the Senator to answer is how an organized fraud ever brought forth a legal election of Mr. Pinchback or anybody else. I wish to know what connection there is between the governorship, if legal or illegal, and the Legislature which was an organized fraud ab initio and has continued Legislature which was an organized fraud ab initio and has continued

Mr. ALCORN. Since the Senator undertakes to direct the course I shall pursue in making my remarks, I expect it would be better for him to wait until I get through and then for him to make his reply. That which brought the Senator from Georgia to his feet was the fact that I was commenting upon the remarks made by his colleague. I was commenting upon remarks made by the other Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Gordon,] in which that Senator asserted that this body had no power to inquire into the elements composing the Legislature of a State. He asserted that positively and unmistakably, and when I then pointed out the remarks of his colleague in which he asserted that the Senate had no power to inquire into the Legislature of a State and then convicted that Senator of an illugical positive in which he as then convicted that Senator of an illogical position, in which he asserted that because a Senate committee had declared that the Legislature that elected Pinchback was illegal, therefore to admit him to a seat in this body would be a monstrosity, the Senator who is replying to me, holding that his colleague's position is true with regard to Ing to me, holding that his colleague's position is true with regard to Louisiana because of the fact that there were two legislatures there, says that it could not be made properly to apply to Mississippi because there was but one legislature in that State.

Mr. NORWOOD. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not say that. Mr. ALCOKN. What did the Senator say?

Mr. NQRWOOD. If I said that I did not mean to say it, although I may resibly have said comething like it.

I may possibly have said something like it.

Mr. ALCORN. Then I ask the Senator the question: Does he hold that this body has power to investigate the elements that compose that this body has power to investigate the elements that compose the Legislature of the State of Mississippi?

Mr. NORWOOD. I do not. I hold to the contrary.

Mr. ALCORN. Then by what authority do you assume that this body had the power to investigate the Legislature of Louisiana?

Mr. NORWOOD. Let me answer.

Mr. ALCORN. The Senator has answered. He said because there were two bodies there; but I say it was not the question of that Legislature at all. I assert that the committee did not investigate the question of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana and it was not that tion of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, and it was not that which it was organized to investigate. The question was whether there was a legal government in the State of Louisiana. In the investigation of that question the scope of that investigation as a matter of course included the election as well of members of the Legislature as of the municipal officers of that State. On the facts the committee reported that there was no legal government there. If that report had been indorsed by the Senate there would have been an end to the Kelbeen indorsed by the Senate there would have been an end to the Kellogg government so far as this body was concerned, but the report was not adopted. On the other hand, the Senate proceeded in the course of time to overrule that report, and not only declared that there was a government in Louisiana but that Kellogg was the governor. This is the point that I am seeking to establish. If I am successful in this, then there can be no legal objection to the warrant under which Mr. Pinchback claims a right to a seat in this body. That follows as a legal deduction. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. Norwood] attempts to convict me of inconsistency in the fact that I argued before the question was decided by the Senate in favor of the position that I the question was decided by the Senate in favor of the position that I assumed when seeking to establish the proposition that there was no government in Louisiana, and because I now argue after the question has been decided that the Senate is bound by its own adjudication.

Mr. NORWOOD. My friend has put an interrogatory to me, and I ask the privilege of answering.

Mr. ALCORN. Well.

Mr. NORWOOD. I say that this body has no right to investigate the constituent elements of a legislature. I think that is a legal proposition which no constitutional lawyer will dispute; and that I understand to be the position of m; colleague when he made his speech in Atlanta. But I say that there is a difference between the two cases; and the very question lying at the foundation of the investigation here was this: did a legislature exist at all in Louisiana? My friend was upon the committee who were investigating that fact, and he came to the conclusion that instead of there being a lawful legisla-

Now, Mr. President, while I am up I beg to refresh my friend's memory by a few words from the report that he signed himself.

Mr. ALCORN. The Senator will excuse me. I am sure there is no better-natured person than myself; but the Senator will have an opportunity to reply to me if he sees proper to do so. If he thinks it of sufficient importance, he can be heard upon this question. I indorse every word that is said in that report as my opinion upon the question at issue at that time, and that was a question as to who was governor of Louisiana, and I held that upon the proofs there was no governor of Louisiana elected then, in my judgment. On this point my friend from Georgia differed with me. He held that the report was not true; that there was a legal government in Louisiana, and that that legal government was McEnery and the legislature elected in conjunction with him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not intend to interrupt the honorable Senator, but as he is now referring to what appears in his report, I wish to call his attention to the fact that the resolution under which he acted was this:

That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be instructed to inquire and report to the Senate whether there is any existing State government in Louisiana, and how and by whom it is constituted.

Then his committee reported at the end of the report certain opinions in the form of resolutions; first that McMillen was not entitled, second that Ray was not entitled, and third that the accompanying bill which declares that there was no lawful government at all there ought to be passed.

Mr. ALCRON. That is just the truth, and it was to inquire into the existing State government of Louisiana that the question was referred. That arose from the fact that there were two applicants here; that was the way the Senate assumed jurisdiction of the case. It arose from the fact that there were two applicants here for a seat in this body, and each under a like authority; each holding in his own hands the seal of the State; each holding the certificate of a person purporting to be governor of the State. The Senate did not know, and could not ascertain without investigation, who the governor was. I have repeated this a dozen times. This position certainly is understood. The Senate will very readily understand the reason why Senators are so oblivious to the point I make. They seek to worry me away from so oblivious to the point I make. They seek to worry me away from the question involved in this case, to destroy the continuity of my argument, and cause me to wander from the subject; but I propose to stick to my text.

The committee having reported that there was no lawful government in Louisiana, and having recommended to the Senate to order an election in that State, and the Senate having refused to indorse that report, having refused to order a new election, but having on the other hand recognized the Kellogg government as the legal government of the State of Louisiana, all parties having recognized the Kellogg government as the government of the State, I ask whether the question was not settled as far as it could be settled, and whether there was any further adjudication that could be lad of this case? there was any further adjudication that could be had of this case? It had gone through all the adjudications that it could possibly pass through in order to legitimize, in order to establish Kellogg as the governor of Louisiana; and now, because I as an individual in this Sanate, held that there was no election there at the time the question was submitted to me, I am to be held as stultifying myself because I yield to the adjudications of that tribunal by whose decisions we are all bound, and recognize the Kellogg government to-day and its au-thority, when there is none in all the broad land to dispute it. Where is the person, where is the organized community of men, where is the is the person, where is the organized community of men, where is the judicial or legislative tribunal in this whole country that to-day disputes the legal authority of the Kellogg government? There is none.

The statement has been made that if the government of Kellogg was founded in fraud it is still a fraud; that no recognition by this body, or by other departments of the Government, or by the people, could be held to purge it of that fraud. The history of the governments of the world refutes this position. Governments conceived in fraud and matured under the influence of corrupt combinations have often received the hearty approval of the people. The recognition of such a government may be the only means of avoiding anarchy. Any government has been regarded as better than no government; and if the only road to the repose of the people lies through the basest frauds and the most stupendous corruptions, the people, guided by the suggestions of wisdom, often willingly submit, as the safest means of protection to life and property. When Napoleon III violated his oath and seized the empire, the world pronounced him a perjurer and a usurper; but when he saluted the nations from his seat on the throne, they were not slow in recognizing him as the head of a powerthrone, they were not slow in recognizing him as the head of a powerful nation and his as the most brilliant government in Europe. The plebiscite indorsed him, and all the world recognized him as the legitimate monarch of the French people.

But in support of this theory an example more recent and perhaps more striking may be referred to. The national democratic convention held in New York in 1868 pronounced the reconstruction acts, including the amendments to the Constitution, as flagrant usurpations of that instrument. These acts were denounced as "unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void;" as tending to subvert our form of government, and end in centralization and despotism. Congress was characterized as the "so called," and the people were appealed to to wipe out the fraud and restore the Federal Union of co-equal States. My friend from Georgia [Mr. Norwood] was eloquent when before the people he arraigned the republican party for what was charged as a crime against civilization—the enfranchisement of the negro. But within a period of four short years this same party, in convention, accepted all these acts of so-called usurpation, promised faithfully to carry them out; that they would not disturb but would maintain them as necessary to the peace and quiet of the country. Horace Greeley, the promoter and defender of the reconstruction acts, whose name had been a reproach in one section of the country, was whose name had been a reproach in one section of the country, was chosen as the leader of this party; and the most cloquent tongue in all the South was brought to the tomb of Charles Sumner to swell the nation's refrain over the grave of the great expounder of the Constitution of his country, to proclaim him the matchless friend of human liberty.

In 1868 the questions of the reconstruction acts were issues before the people. The people, before whose mature judgment we must all yield obedience, were moving to the judgment of the court of last resort. In 1872 the people had rendered their verdict, and the democratic party, as it was its duty to do, wisely recognized the judgment and promised its cordial support. Who will say that that party stultified itself in yielding obedience to a cardinal principle that under-

lies all governments of the people?

I invoke this principle in the case before us. The question looks beyond Pinchback and Kellogg. If it were to stop with them, the subject would not be worth considering; but the precedent may be hereafter invoked to deprive your State or mine of representation in this body. If the caprice of Senators in the admission of members to this body is to go unchallenged, then, in truth, we are masters of the field and may hold it, however great the wrong.

It is said that the Senate is the judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of its members. That is true; but if the Senate be the judge of the election, qualification, and returns, is it not to judge upon forms prescribed by law? Take the case of a judge who is the judge of the law of the case; if a question of a statute of Lonisiana was judge of the law of the case; if a question of a statute of Louisiana was before the Supreme Court of the United States to-day, that court would adjudge the statute upon the certificate of the governor of that State upon the forms prescribed by law; and the judges would be bound in considering that statute to render their judgment upon the law after the form that is given for the adjudication of such questions.

Now, Mr. President, I will pass from that point Mr. STEVENSON. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALCORN. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENSON. I understood the Senator from Mississippi to claim that I was wrong just now in supposing that the testimony taken by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, of which he was a member and in whose report he concurred informing the Senate that there had been no legal election held in Louisiana in 1872, and that there was no valid subsisting State government in January, 1873, would be legitimate evidence in the Pinchback investigation. Did I understand the Senator correctly that my position was erroneous as matter of law?

Mr. ALCORN. I stated the fact that Pinchback was not a party to that proceeding.

Mr. STEVENSON. Now, will the Senator allow me to read to him the highest possible authority upon this question, which could be brought to his notice? I refer to a speech of the Senator himself made upon the precise point. In that speech the Senator claimed directly that the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections was conclusive upon the fact that the legislature which elected Pinchback was not a valid legislature and that he was not entitled to his seat.

That is the precise position I take now.

Mr. ALCORN. If the Senator had no more respect for my speeches han I have, he would not urge that as authority upon me at all.

Laughter.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I have the highest respect for the gentleman's opinions, and in reading his speech I only desire that he should have as high a respect for his own argument, especially when made on the right side, as I have.

Mr. ALCORN. I stated the fact in the speech which I made that a

Mr. ALCORN. I stated the fact in the speech which I made that a case was adjudicated that involved all the questions of fact that were involved in the Pinchback case. That the Senator will find in my speech, and I will tell the Senator further what he will find in that speech. I held the opinion that if the Senate should adjudicate the Kellogg government as the legal government of Louisiana, then I should hold myself bound by that adjudication and conform my action to the declared judgment of the Senate, which I held to be binding on me.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have before me what the Senator said on that occasion. I propose now to read. When the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Morton] made the objection that the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections was not testimony against Pinchback, because he was not a party to that investigation, the Senator from Mississippi replied, as I did this morning, that the facts found by the committee as to the invalidity or non-existence of any State government in Louisiana at the time Pinchback was elected bound Pinchback and was conclusive against his title to a seat here. Now the Senator recants his former position, by which he so ably controverted the argument of the Senator from Indiana, and insists that the facts found in this report are not evidence against Pinchback because his credentials were not then before the Senate and he was not a party to the investigation. Will the Senator allow me to read briefly what he said?

I wish to sav-

Let the Senator take notice that this speech was on the pending motion to seat Pinchback on a prima facie title.

I wish to say, in behalf of the committee, that when this question came before them it was one with which the committee were well acquainted. Twelve months ago this same question—was before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and a long, tedious, patient, laborious investigation was had by that committee in inquiring into all the facts involved in the present controversy.

Just my position now-

What was that? Pinchback's prima facie title on his credentials.

The result of that investigation was published in a volume embracing more than a thousand pages. The witnesses lived nearly two thousand miles away. Twelve months ago they were brought before the committee and examined fully and thoroughly, and cross-examined. The testimony was published to the country. It is a part of the history of the country; it has become a part of the records of the Senate; it is before the Senate.

This testimony and these records were before the committee at the time we were called upon to investigate this case the other day. The committee did not go into the detail of investigation when called to the investigation at this session of Congress; and why? Because all that detail of investigation had been made more than twelve months ago, and it was not necessary to go into it again. It was not proper to put the Government to the expense, and we did not see proper to ask the Senate to allow us to send for persons and papers for the purpose of going over the same track that had been so well beaten twelve months ago. Therefore, with this testimony before the committee, with this record before the committee, with this testimony before the committee, with this record before the committee, with this testimony and said to the Senate, "The committee is unable to agree; four and four, the committee are divided in their room, and they bring the case to the Senate and state to the Senate the facts as they exist."

Now, sir, I contend that the testimony is here; it is part of the records of the country; it is part of the history of the country. Why, sir, the fact is that there were no credentials were embraced in the report that was made by the committee twelve months ago. That this very question was investigated twelve months ago. That this very question was investigated twelve months ago. That this very question was investigated twelve months ago—not, to be sure, between the parties now here—but that it was substantially investigated

Mr. ALCORN. Are you going to read all the speech?
Mr. STEVENSON. It is so pertinent and contains so much good reading that I hate to lose a word.

Mr. President, I only rose to make the point that all the testimony that was taken by the Committee on Privileges and Elections twelve months ago was before that committee the other day, and that upon those facts, and those facts alone, it was that the committee reported back to the Senate that they were unable to agree. It was said the other day that there were some other facts, but members of the committee stated that they were acquainted with the other facts that were proposed to be introduced, and they were free to say that the disclosure of those facts before the committee would make no difference with regard to their judgment in the case, and hence the additional facts that are stated to be now present or ready to be reported it was not precessary to report, upon at all it was not necessary to report upon at all.

How strong, how conclusive, was the argument of the Senator from Mississippi then upon the legal and conclusive effect of the report and its findings against Pinchback's title! The fact found by that committee, that there was not a valid State government in Louisiana in January, 1873; that the Kellogg government, including the Legislature which then elected both Ray and Pinchback, was a fraud and shame, the mere excrescence of arbitrary usurped power, was binding not only upon Pinchback but upon the world. I concurred with the Senator from Mississippi in his argument then; I think it equally

Mr. ALCORN. That it was not conclusive of Pinchback's claim is evidenced by the fact that Pinchback's claim is to-day being discussed in the Senate. That was an argument that I used before the Senate in endeavoring to enforce the views that I held then in regard to the election in Louisiana. That was a speech that was made by me to the Senate giving reasons sufficient to wait it to be writed. by me to the Senate giving reasons sufficient to my mind to show that there was no legal government in the State of Louisiana; but the Senate decided otherwise. The Senate decided that there was a legal government in Louisiana; and when the Senate adjudicated that fact, then the argument I made was in the nature of an argument

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator be kind enough to say when and how the Senate decided that there was a legal legislature in Louisi-

Mr. ALCORN. Decided by a resolution in this body recognizing the Kellogg government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did it recognize the Kellogg government?

Mr. ALCORN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does the Senator mean by "the Kellogg overnment?"
Mr. ALCORN.

Mr. ALCORN. Kellogg as governor of the State of Louisiana.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will address the Chair.
Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Mississippi, with the permission of the Chair, if he will be kind enough to read to us the resolution, if he has it, that we did adopt, which will enable us all to know precisely what we did declare.

Mr. ALCORN. I have it not before me now, not supposing I would be called upon for that resolution; but I think I can find it.

Mr. WEST. Hore it is

Mr. WEST. Here it is.
Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Louisiana has it.
Mr. ALCORN. Will you be kind enough to read it to the Senate? Mr. EDMUNDS. With pleasure.

Resolved, That the action of the President in protecting the government in Louisiana, of which W. P. Kellogg is the executive, and the people of that State against domestic violence and in enforcing laws of the United States in that State, is approved.

That was the resolution.

Mr. ALCORN. Very well. Then if the Senate of the United States indorsed the President who had recognized the Kellogg government, and indorsed his action in the face of its refusal to pass a law declaring that the election in Louisiana was without effect, it certainly was to all intents and purposes a declaration in favor of the Kellogg government. Will the Senator say that it was not? Does the Senator hold that the Kellogg government has not been recognized by this body?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I will answer with the permission

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I will answer with the permission of the Chair, if the Senator desires me to do so.

Mr. ALCORN. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I stand by the resolution which the Senate adopted as we all did, I believe, just as we had done all the time before. When the thing first broke out, I believe everybody on this side of the Chamber defended the action of the President of the United States, with the information he had before him, in protecting the people of the State of Louisiana against domestic violence. That was perfectly consistent with the bill which the Senator himself reported. If there was no lawful government in the State of Louisiana. ported. If there was no lawful government in the State of Louisiana the President was bound to protect any government that was administering the law and keeping the peace that happened to exist there until we could get a lawful government. The Senator ought to know that that resolution does not bear, and he knows perfectly well that it was not intended to bear by anybody who proposed it or discussed it, the meaning that this Senate was declaring, by that resolution of approval of the action of the President in protecting the people of that State, that it believed the legislature, so called, that elected Ray and Pinchback was a lawful body at the time they performed those acts. That is the difference; but I admit, because I am bound to be frank, that the Senator is now pressing his case upon the strongest ground that it has, and that is an estoppel, which is to keep us from the truth, as the language about estoppels is.

Mr. ALCORN. Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator. I now submit to the Senator the position that I assume: that this body has recognized the Kellogg government. The Senator from Vermont denies that this body has done so. I understand this issue to be directly joined between the Senator and myself, I asserting and he denying. Now, I will again read the resolution that was adopted by this body.

Resolved, That the action of the President in protecting the government in Louisiana, of which W. P. Kellogg is the executive—

A declaration by this body that William P. Kellogg is the executive of the State of Louisiana; and the Senator from Vermont rises in his place and declares this is not a recognition by this body of Kellogg place and declares this is not a recognition by this body of Kellogg as governor of that State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not risen in my place, or said anything of the kind, or intended to say anything of the kind.

Mr. ALCORN. Then I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I maintained at the very first, when the question first opened, as I have ever since, that Kellogg was the executive. I maintain it now, just as I stated ten minutes ago. He was the executive authority in fact, exercising the functions of governor in that State, and as such the President of the United States defended him from the domestic violence which was to overturn anything, and appealed to Congress to take some step to rectify the state of anarchy and chaos which was being threatened in that State. That resolution, if the Senator will apply his mind to it as the saying is, does not say—it carefully avoids saying—that any government in the State of Louisiana is a constitutional government. It says that whatever exists there the President has been perfectly right in upholding in order to preserve the peace and rights of citizens of the United States. order to preserve the peace and rights of citizens of the United States.

That is what it says, and it says no more.

Mr. ALCORN. Every person of ordinary understanding will construe this very plain resolution for himself. This resolution declares—

That the action of the President in protecting the government-

What government?

the government in Louisiana, of which W. P. Kellogg is the executive.

There are two propositions: first, a government; that is recognized; it is not anarchy; it is not disorder; it is a government; and, second, William P. Kellogg is the executive of that government; and among those who voted for that resolution I find the name of the honorable Senator from Vermont recorded among the "yeas."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly; I would vote for it again to-day.
Mr. ALCORN. It is not worth while for us to debate that question any further. There is the recognition, as I take it to be, and that recognition I claim binds me. But, Mr. President—

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question in that connection?

tion in that connection?

Mr. ALCORN. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Sevator says that resolution bound him; but it so happened, if I recollect correctly, that the Senator came out in a very powerful speech in favor of admitting Pinchback before that resolution was passed. Did it bind him in advance?

Mr. ALCORN. Mr. President, if the Senator will refresh his memory, I think he will know very well that when I made that speech which he declares to be a very powerful one, it was when the House of Representatives had already recognized the Kellogg government, and when the foreshadowing was here unmistakable that this body would do the same thing. The question was res adjudicata, already adjudicated, and I stated so at the time, that the Kellogg government had been recognized by the President; that the Senate had refused to adopt the bill that had been reported by the committee; that the House of Representatives had recognized the Kellogg tee; that the House of Representatives had recognized the Kellogg government; and that the Senate had already determined to do the same thing. Then I said admit Pinchback, for the Constitution of same thing. Then I said admit Pinchback, for the Constitution of the United States declares that no State without its consent shall be deprived of its equal representation in the Senate of the United States. Louisiana, without her consent, has for three years been deprived of her full representation in this body, and I proposed that that injustice and that outrage upon the Constitution should cease.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to call attention to a

Mr. ALCORN. Yes, sir.
Mr. MORTON. I call the Senator's attention to this fact: that this resolution was a broad and unequivocal recognition of the whole Kellogg government, not of Kellogg as governor defacto, but of the government of which he is the executive, including the Legislature and ernment of which he is the executive, including the Legislature and every department of it.

Mr. ALCORN. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. The resolution is broad and unequivocal in its language, and no mental reservation, no narrow construction put upon it by any Senator can change the legal effect of it.

Mr. ALCORN. So I hold it to be; but I stated that the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from North Carolina upon another occasion had declared the fact that Pinchback was unworthy of a seat in this body for the reason that he had been a conject in the pention. in this body for the reason that he had been a convict in the penitentiary of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. NORWOOD. Which Senator from Georgia does the Senator

refer to?

Mr. ALCORN. Your colleague. I read his language a while ago. He said that he was so charged; he did not assert that he had been, but said that he was charged with having been. I gave this as a reason to show the injustice of refusing to admit a Senator upon this floor on the credentials that he receives from the governor; that it is arbitrary on the part of the Senate to organize itself here upon a letter of a the interval of the States and available. ter of authority derived from the governors of the States and exclude another person who comes and claims a vacant seat upon precisely the same title-papers under which each and every one of us hold our seats here; that the rule is to admit the Senator, and if irregularities are made to appear, or if the Senator is shown to be unworthy a seat in this body, the Senate has the power to eject that Senator who was admitted and turn him out of his place. The Senate has within the last two years pursued that course in the case of Caldwell, who was admitted to a seat in this body upon his certificate of election, his prima facie case, and afterward, upon an investigation, he, to escape the judgment of the Senate, resigned his seat. So far as the charges against Pinchback are concerned, I deem it

So far as the charges against Pinchback are concerned, I deem it proper to say here that they are not well taken; that there is not one word of truth in the statement with regard to Mr. Pinchback ever having been, so far as I know or believe, convicted of any infamous crime. He was, by a provost-marshal during the war, imprisoned for an assault upon a man of his own color, and remained in prison for a time, not under the adjudication of any court, but under the declaration or adjudication of a provost-marshal, a military judge. How many men of the South were sent to prison during the war under the adjudications of provost-marshals?

I desire to offer some testimony which ought to be of force with my democratic friends touching the character of Mr. Pinchback. It will be remembered that Mr. McMillen was elected by the McEnery legislature; that he bore credentials signed by McEnery; that the democrats of this body voted to admit him to a seat in the Senate; he was held to be worthy. I send to the Clerk a letter signed by Mr. McMillen which I desire to have read. This, I will say, was a letter of introduction given to Mr. Pinchback when he was going to the Chicago convention, at the time that President Grant was nominated.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, LA., May 8, 1868.

GENTLEMEN: I take pleasure in introducing my friend, Captain P. B. S. Pinchback, one of the republican delegates at large from this State to the Chicago convention. Captain Pinchback is a representative man of the colored people of this State, and as such was chosen a delegate by our recent State convention. You will find him an accomplished, agreeable gentleman, and I ask for him the courtesies and kindly consideration of yourselves and other friends from Ohio.

Very respectfully, your friend,

W. L. McMILLEN.

Hon. R. C. Harrison. Wm. R. Thrall, M. D.

Mr. ALCORN. There is an indorsement of Mr. Pinchback by Mr. McMillen, who was voted for as one entirely worthy, and properly so, of a seat in this body.

Now with regard to the character of Mr. Pinchback. He is a colored man; his father, or his reputed father, lived in the State that I in part represent. I had some acquaintance with him when I first removed to the State of Mississippi, over thirty years ago. After the death of his father, the claimant to this seat went with his mother to the city of Cincinnati. He there had some scanty opportunities of When next he appeared in the Southern States, it was in education. the capacity of a waiter upon a steamboat. He rose from the rank of a waiter to that of a steward; he was never a barber, as has been said, though it would not have been discreditable to him if he had been; but he rose to the rank of steward upon one of the largest steamboats upon the southern waters. The position of steward to a colored man was the maximum to which he could look for exaltation in the days of slavery. It is a position of trust; it devolves upon him the outlay of large sums of money for his employers; it is one that requires administrative capacity. Pinchback, I maintain, among the boatmen of the river in the days of slavery, held a reputation equal to that of any other steward upon the Mississippi River for honesty and integrity. Pinchback is a man who always had the good sense in the days of slavery to know his place, and to not force himself out of his position. He has never, he tells me, in his life had a difficulty with a white man; he has never in his life been involved in any serious trouble with any white person. A well-behaved man in the days of slavery, he maintained himself and reached the highest point to which a colored man could rise as a business man in the communities of the South.

While the war was going on Mr. Pinchback offered his services to the Government, and joined the Federal forces at New Orleans. He behaved himself in such a way as to win the respect of his superiors and secure the confidence of his own race. At the close of the war he was elected to the Legislature of Louisiana, became lieutenant-governor and then governor of the State. Next he was elected Congressman at large from the State of Louisiana, and to-day he is knocking at the door of the Senate for admission as a Senator of the United States, waving in his hand the proper credentials signed by the gov-ernor of Louisiana with the broad seal of the State attached. The Senate sees proper to deny him admission; I see proper for what it is worth to make this vindication of a man who has been denounced and denied admission to this body, as one unworthy to be recognized in the capacity to which he is accredited by his State. The justice of the position I maintain here is demonstrated in the case which I pre-The Senate holds itself in the attitude of a close corporation arbitrarily refusing an accredited Senator from the State of Louisiana admission to this body; he is slandered and abused without an opportunity of being permitted to offer a word in his own vindication.

There is one other point which is not germane to this question; but while I am up I wish to refer to it; and as my friend from Georgia is in his seat, I will call his attention to another paragraph in the speech of his colleague at Atlanta. I regret exceedingly that his colleague is not here to-day. I wish to call attention to it for the purpose of directing the attention of the Senate to the recklessness with which speeches are made touching the republican party in the South, and the action of public men. He says:

There is scarcely a judge in some of these wretched governments-

who has not mocked justice and shamed the ermine upon his shoulders, while not a few have been convicted of gross frauds and embezzlements. This is true in Louisiana from the chief justice down; and in Mississippi and South Carolina that lawyer ought to be stricken from the bar as an imbecile who would expect a decision in accordance with the law.

I wish to state just here that the statement of the honorable Sena-I wish to state just here that the statement of the honorable sena-tor from Georgia does a grievous wrong to the judiciary of the State of Mississippi. I claim the privilege of alluding to this statement from the fact that each and every one of the judges in the State of Missis-sippi, distinguishing judges from chancellors, was appointed by my-self while governor of that State; the supreme court of that State was appointed by me; and each and every circuit judge who now holds his place was so appointed by me. I hold that there has not been at any time in the State of Mississippi a more pure and able judiciary than exists to-day, confining that statement to the supreme court and to the circuit judges in that State. I will offer to the Senate some democratic authority going to establish the character of at least some of the judges in that State.

The Legislature of the State of Mississippi to-day is largely demo-The Legislature of the State of Mississippi to-day is largely democratic. Under the constitution of the State the Legislature can by a two-thirds vote address a judge out of his place. He need not be impeached. He can be by address removed from office. There has been no attempt made by the Legislature, although it possesses a two-thirds democratic majority, to address any circuit judge out of his position. There has not been a single imputation, so far as I am aware, against a single judge that presides in that State to-day.

I would say that the chief justice of that State, an able lawyer, a pure man, one who has the respect of all the people of the State, whose judicial knowledge is not questioned by any one, and whose whose judicial knowledge is not questioned by any one, and whose virtue and purity has never been brought in question, being old, and the democrats doubtless being desirous of having a representation upon that bench of their own, have passed a law, as is reported in the newspapers, to retire this judge upon his salary of $3,000 a year. They supposed that on account of his advanced age perhaps he would be willing to accept the salary he now receives and go into retirement. It is not likely that the democratic legislature would do this for a judge who was so corrupt that any lawyer who would expect, in the language of the Senator from Georgia, a correct decision from him, ought to be stricken from the rolls, or, as he puts it, stricken from the bar. I say it is not likely that a legislature like this would pass a law to retire a judge upon his salary who was thus corrupt, and whose corruptions were subject to investigation by the Legis lature, and which corruptions the Legislature had a right to correct by removal or by address from office. On this point I will read from the Vicksburgh Herald, a democratic paper, the following article, which has been published and indorsed by the Meridian Gazette and other democratic papers in the State:

A vacancy—perhaps more than one—will soon occur on the supreme bench of the State, and it is highly important that the supreme bench should have the vacancy supplied by some eminent lawyer of unquestioned legal learning, scholarship, and culture. We know of no one who will more completely answer the requirements indicated than Hon. Wiley P. Harris.

A very distinguished lawyer in that State, and a very pure man.

His appointment to the supreme bench would, we venture to affirm, give complete satisfaction to the bar of the State. In the event of the retirement of the present able and worthy chief justice, Peyton, the position of chief justice would, without doubt, be, by common consent, accorded to Justice H. F. Simrall.

He is one of the associate justices.

Justice Tarbell-

The last and all now being mentioned-

Justice Tarbell has brought to the discharge of his duties both industry and capacity. We earnestly trust that Judge W. P. Harris will consent to accept the position which we are sure will be offered him; a position, too, which his varied talents are so well calculated to adorn.

Here, now, is a democratic authority, an influential paper in the State, going to indorse the supreme court of that State as able, as worthy, as holding the confidence of the people of the State. that the statement that is made by this paper represents the facts touching the supreme court of that State. Now, with regard to the circuit judges, I will read from a democratic paper—not always the highest authority, I confess, but nevertheless good in this case as against themselves—and I read it for the purpose of offsetting the statement made by the Senator from Georgia, the imputation that he sees proper to make touching the character of the judges in the State of Mississippi, about which I must take it he certains in the sees proper to make touching the character of the judges in the State of Mississippi, about which I must take it he certains as the sees proper to make touching the character of the judges in the State of Mississippi, about which I must take it he certain the sees proper to make touching the character of the judges in the State of Mississippi. tainly knows nothing; a statement which, if true, would reflect discredit upon the people of the State that I here represent.

The Lowndes Independent, a democratic paper published at Columbus, Mississippi, referring to the circuit judge of that district, quotes an article from the Memphis Appeal, a paper having a large circulation in Mississippi, and uses this language:

The following indorsement of Judge Orr by that leading democratic journal the Memphis Appeal adds another to the many flattering evidences that he is the choice of the people of this district, without regard to party or race. We believe the senate will act for the best interests of the judiciary and confirm him if nominated by the governor. The Appeal of the 16th says:

Nearly all the newspapers of his circuit are urging the re-election of Judge Orr, of Mississippi, of whom the Holly Springs South, coupling him with Smiley, of the Natchez district—

Another judge in that Statesays that a better circuit judge never, perhaps, presided in the State

This is democratic authority. Here are two judges at least of the circuits and all the supreme judges indorsed by leading newspapers of the State, claiming to represent the public sentiment and holding that the judiciary of that State is above assailment.

Judge Orr is the choice of three-fourths of the white citizens of this judicial dis-

And Judge Orr is an unmistakable republican. He is a man who stands upon his convictions as a republican unmistakably before the people of the State. He is not one to conceal his political views, although a proper respect for the position he holds prevents him from mingling in political contests or appearing upon the hustings. He preserves the respectability of his place, he preserves the ermine of a judge, and holds the good opinion of the people of the State of

All the democratic officers-elect in Colfax County, and a number of the most rominent democrats in the county, have recommended the appointment.

The same thing may be said of Judge Smiley in another portion of The same thing may be said of Judge Smiley in another portion of the State, and the same thing may be said of every judge who holds office to-day in the State of Mississippi under my appointment. Why, sir, one of the circuit judges in that State, at one time before the war, occupied with great credit to himself and satisfaction to the people the position of judge of the high court of errors and appeals in that State. He was elected to that office, for then the office was elective. He is to-day a circuit judge upon the bench, and no man in the State holds a higher position as a lawyer and as a pure judge than Judge Fisher. than Judge Fisher.

So the imputation upon the judiciary of the State of Mississippi, come from whatever source it may, is false. The Senator from Georgia doubtless spoke upon information that he had received, and not upon any information that lay within his own knowledge with regard to the judiciary of Mississippi. He was in the State of Mississippi last fall upon an electioneering tour, and it cannot be possible that he heard any respectable man say a word contrary to that which I assert here to be true, when I say that I have never heard the judiciary of Mississippi called in question by one single person in that State, either democrat or republican.

I said, sir, that I had not heard their integrity called in question. I might qualify that by saying that I have seen flings at the judiciary on account of decisions which they rendered touching the results of the war, and I will read from a newspaper to show wherein it is that the judiciary of the State of Mississippi is not held by a certain class of political thinkers as orthodox and not sufficient for the necessities of the times.

Mr. NORWOOD rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. ALCORN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORWOOD. I am sorry that my colleague is not here to hear the Senator from Mississippi. As he states, my colleague was in Mississippi last fall during the campaign. I know nothing of the facts cited by him in his speech at Atlanta. I wish therefore he were here to reply. I presume, however, that his statement was based upon information which he received when he was in Mississippi.

Mr. ALCORN. I do not think it can have been possible that he re-Mr. ALCORN. I do not think it can have been possible that he received any such information in Mississippi. I judge that he received it outside of Mississippi. He was talking to a Georgia Legislature. He certainly had a right to talk to that Legislature, for he was responsible to them; but I claim that he was speaking wide of the mark when he assailed either the ability or the integrity of the judiciary of Mississippi. I judge my friend from Georgia made the imputation without due reflection; certainly he must have spoken without deliberation; he would not, I know, do the judges of my State a willful wrong.

I now read from a democratic paper in the State of Mississippi, which quotes from another and influential paper a criticism upon the supreme court of that State, and it will be seen that there is nothing here which assails the integrity or the ability of that court, but the grounds will be seen upon which the court is assailed. Before the war the railroads of the State of Mississippi had borrowed from the State certain trust funds. These were held by the State in gold for the use of the public schools in a certain district of Mississippi. They were loaned to the railroads, the railroads agreeing to pay interest in perpetuity. It was money derived from the sale of the sixteenth sections. The railroads became indebted to the State in the sum of sections. The railroads became indebted to the State in the sum of $800,000, the State agreeing to become responsible to the cestui que trusts, the children of the district. When the war was going on, and when it had advanced up to the year 1863 or 1864; when the State of Mississippi had issued a large amount of warrants, bills of credit or representatives of value, debentures, if you please, and had this debt floating in the country, it was desirable for the preservation of the credit of the State that the indebtedness should be taken up. The railroads ever alive to their interest came to the Legislature of the reilroads, ever alive to their interest, came to the Legislature of the State and proposed that they would pay their indebtedness to the State in warrants of the State of Mississippi. The proposition was accepted. The railroads did not, however, pay the State of Mississippi in her own paper; but they paid in confederate money the debt, and the proper authorities accepted this confederate money in payment of the debt. While governor of the State of Mississippi I contested the legality of the appropriate and held that it was not in the first least the state of the same of the state of the same of the state of the same of the gality of the payment, and held that it was not, in the first place, a compliance with the law, and in the next place it was in aid of the rebellion, and that the railroads still owed the debt to the State of Mississippi; for it will be remembered that confederate money at the Mississippi; for it will be remembered that confederate money at the time this payment was made was about twenty-five or thirty dollars to one. The case was argued in the chancery court and decided in favor of the State and against the railroads. It was taken to the supreme court. The supreme court of the State of Mississippi affirmed the decision of the chancellor. The comment to which I desired to call the attention of the Senate for the purpose of showing the animus of the opposition to the courts of the State of Mississippi is in these words. these words:

The Clarion, an influential paper in the State, quotes this from the Meridian Mercury:

Meridian Mercury:

The supreme court has decided the great railroad cases, wherein money was loaned to the roads before and paid back during the war in confederate money under special authority of an act of the Legislature, adversely to the railroads. The ground upon which the decision rests is, the act was in aid of the rebellion, so called, and therefore void. How that could be deduced is a mystery. Hithe State, which was raising troops and furnishing supplies as a State and doing something continually to help carry on the war, had demanded of the road to make payment in gold or its equivalent—cotton for instance—would not that which strengthened the hands of the State and gave it more power have had more the appearance of aiding the rebellion, so called? We have not seen the learned briefs and arguments of counsel on either side, but we do not hesitate to say that the decision is an absurdity, and based upon a ridiculous non sequitur. Tarbell delivered the decision. It is suspicious of "results of the war" too much on the judicial brain. If we were a member of the Legislature, we would introduce a bill to legalize the payment in confederate money, even at the risk, if it should pass, of inuring to the benefit of the "wreckers" of the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, which had an interest in the suit of about $30,000. The State is in honor bound to keep its confederate faith with the roads, and, for one, we are for doing it. And we should like to know what power can prevent a State from maintaining inviolate her contracts with railroads made during the war against the technical decision of her own judges, carpet-baggers or domestic scalawags, that the act was in aid of rebellion. It is for a State to take advantage of her own wrong to avoid her contracts.

We should like to know what power can prevent a State from maintaining inviolate her contracts with railroads made during the war against the technical decision of her own judges, carpet-baggers, or domestic scalawags that the act was in aid of rebellion.

The State is in honor bound to keep its confederate foith with the reads.

The State is in honor bound to keep its confederate faith with the roads

And "the State is in honor bound to keep its confederate faith" is taught by the democratic papers in Mississippi. It is held by a large number at least of the democrats of the South to-day. What matters it that the Constitution of the United States declares that-

Neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void!

The courts of the State of Mississippi as they are now organized recognize as binding upon them the amendments to the Constitution of the United States. The courts as they are now organized hold obedience, as they are required to do, to the Constitution of the United States. For this it is, and for this alone, that they are criticised by the press in the State of Mississippi; not that they are corrupt, not that they are dishonest, not that they are without qualifications, but simply that they are loyal to the demands of the Constitution.

Mr. EDMUNDS obtained the floor.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I wish the Seastor from Vermont would give way. There is some important business that I want to lay before the Senate in executive session. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at three o'clock and fifty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

fifty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Wednesday, March 1, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

AMENDMENT OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. KNOTT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2434) to correct an error in section 5271 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed. He also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2433) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDIO MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. PAGE. At the request of my colleague, Mr. PIPER, who is absent on account of sickness, I ask unanimous consent to present for reference and printing a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of California in relation to the cession of the Presidio mil-itary reservation to the city of San Francisco for a public park.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was received, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

HON. ROBERT C. SCHENCK.

Mr. KASSON. I ask unanimous consent to present for adoption at the present time the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved. That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be, and are hereby, instructed to communicate to Hon. Robert C. Schenck a copy of the testimony taken by them in the matter concerning his relation to the Emma Mine enterprise, and inform him of their willingness to receive from him any statement of facts relative thereto; and that the same be done prior to reporting thereon to this House.

Mr. KASSON. This is a simple matter of justice and fair play. I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withhold the right to object while I inquire whether this comes from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. KASSON. It does not. I offer it simply on my own motion as a matter of justice and fair play toward a gentleman whom nearly all of us on this floor once knew, and who ought to be informed of the character of hearsay evidence that is being received by the committee. And whether it be hearsay evidence or not, every man ought to have an opportunity to be heaved in his own defence before over to have an opportunity to be heard in his own defense before any finding be made against him.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. I object to the resolution for the reason that no member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, so far as I can see, is now present.

Mr. KASSON. If the resolution be adopted, I will not move to reconsider and lay on the table; so that, if it be deemed necessary, some gentleman on the other side may afterward make a motion to reconsider.

Mr. HOLMAN. The resolution had better be withdrawn until some member of the committee is present.

Mr. KASSON. With the understanding that I may offer it hereafter. Mr. HOLMAN and others. Of course.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the res-

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. I certainly must object till some member of the committee can be present.

The SPEAKER. There being objection, the resolution is not re-

HEIRS OF ANDY AUSTIN.

Mr. GUNTER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2435) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Andy Austin; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ELIJAH DAVIDSON.

Mr. GUNTER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2436) for the relief of Elijah Davidson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. GUNTER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2437) to repeal section 3480 of the Revised Statutes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

J. M. HOBBS.

Mr. GUNTER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2438) for the relief of J. M. Hobbs, of Benton County, Arkansas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ANTOINE POULLAIN.

Mr. BLOUNT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2439) for the relief of Antoine Poullain; which was read a first and second time, referred, with accompanying papers, to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ALLEYS IN WASHINGTON CITY.

Mr. McCRARY, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary a bill (H. R. No. 2215) to provide for changes in alleys in the city of Washington by assent of parties interested; and moved that the same be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT BOARD OF HEALTH.

Mr. WILLARD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2440) to further define and regulate the powers and duties of the board of health of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

CHEAP TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. MEADE. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Railways and Canals, I present the memorial of the New York Cheap Transportation Association, and move that it be printed and recommitted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVERS OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2441) authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

VENTILATION OF THE HALL.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, members of the House have called upon the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in reference to the impurity of the atmosphere in this Hall, but the committee, doubting whether it had authority to take any action in the premises, have instructed me to report the following resolution and ask for its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be, and the same is hereby, authorized and empowered to adopt such measures as may be necessary to secure the proper ventilation of the Hall of this House.

There was no objection, and the resolution was adopted.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CLYMER. I am directed by the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department to ask the leave of the House for that committee to sit during the sessions of the House.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MRS. PHŒBE C. OAKLEY.

Mr. BRADLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2442) legalizing the homestead entry of Mrs. Phebe C. Oakley, of Bay County, Michigan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

SAVINGS-BANKS.

Mr. BALLOU, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2443) to amend section 3408 of the Revised Statutes as to savingsbanks; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. MARTHA J. ROBINSON.

Mr. NEW, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2444) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha J. Robinson, widow of James H. Robinson, late a private in the Fifth Indiana Cavalry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANIES' DEBTS TO THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. DURHAM, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire what legislation, if any, is necessary to secure indemnity to the United States for advances of interest paid and to be paid by the Government on account of subsidy bonds issued to the several Pacific railroad companies, and to secure indemnity against liability to pay the principal of such bonds by requiring the creation of a sinking fund, or otherwise. Also, whether the issue of the companies' mortgage bonds, under the act of 1864, was in excess of the amount necessary for the completion of said roads, and, if so, whether such issues are a first lien upon the roads. Also, whether any of the bonds of the United States issued in aid of such roads are a first lien on the same. Also, to what extent the freights and transportation on said roads can be regulated by Congress so as to make the same less burdensome to the people; and that the committee report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. LAWRENCE. What committee does the centleman propose to

Mr. LAWRENCE. What committee does the gentleman propose to have that referred to?

Mr. DURHAM. To the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The first part of that resolution has already been adopted and sent to that committee.

Mr. DURHAM. I know it has, but my resolution is an enlargement of the inquiry referred to that committee. I wish also to have that committee inquire into the subject of freight and transportation, and what regulation is necessary on the part of this Congress.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I think the first motion covers the whole thing, and there is therefore no necessity for this additional resolution.

Mr. DURHAM. It is an enlargement of the inquiry originally referred to the committee, and there can be no objection to it.

The resolution was adopted.

SALE OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY.

Mr. CATE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 78) instructing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain property and dispose of the proceeds thereof; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES A. WALDEMAR.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2445) for the relief of Charles A. Waldemar, late captain Fifth Missouri Cavalry Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CORRECTION OF DATE OF COMMISSIONS.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2446) to correct the date of commission of a certain officer of the Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT FOR 1874.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing is hereby requested to examine into the expediency of having one hundred copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1874 printed and bound for each member of Congress, for the purpose of distribution, and report to this House.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I would suggest that the gentleman include also the report of 1875.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I ask that the resolution may be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. This matter is under consideration at this time by the Committee on Printing and will be determined in a few days, as soon as a resolution is introduced in regard to printing the report for 1875. The resolution is unnecessary, and I object.

FREEDMEN'S BRANCH OF ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Adjutant-General on the freedmen's branch of the Adjutant-General's Office for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BRIDGE ACROSS SAINT JOSEPH'S HARBOR.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with House resolution of the 14th February, the report of engineer officers upon the location of a bridge across the harbor of Saint Joseph, Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. POTTER. This is a short report, and I ask that it may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. DUNNELL. I object.

INPROVEMENT OF WISCONSIN RIVER.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of Major D. C. Houston on the improvement of the Wisconsin River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

SAINT ANTHONY'S FALLS, MINNESOTA.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a copy of a report by Major Farquhar on the preservation of Saint Anthony's Falls, Minnesota; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

SURVEY OF HARLEM RIVER.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of Lieutenant-Colonel Newton on the survey of Harlem River from Randall's Island to Spuyten Duyvil Creek, New York; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

IMPROVEMENT OF GALVESTON HARBOR.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a request from the Committee on Commerce of the 12th of February, the report of the Chief of Engineers on the improvement of Galveston Harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BRIDGE AT SIOUX CITY

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a request from the Committee on Military Affairs of January 26, a report of Major C. R. Suter, Corps of Engineers, on the bill (H. R. No. 313) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at Sioux City, Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs Affairs.

MORNING HOUR.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty-three minutes before one o'clock, and the regular order is the calling of committees for reports of a public nature. The call still rests with the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

There were no further reports from the Committee on Public Buildings and Ground Grounds.

ings and Grounds.

CLERK FOR COMMITTEE.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana, from the Committee of Accounts, re-ported back the following resolution, with the recommendation that

Resolved. That the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department be authorized to employ a clerk for sixty days, at a compensation of $5 per day.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXPENDITURES ON NEW YORK POST-OFFICE.

Mr. METCALFE. The Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings, to whom was referred a resolution directing an examination into the amount of money expended on the New York post-office, have directed me to report it back with the recommendation that it be agreed to.

The Clerk read the resolution as follows:

Resolved. That the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings be authorized to inquire into the amounts of money expended for the erection and completion of the New York post-office, and for this purpose they are authorized to employ a clerk, at a salary of not more than $5 per day, and to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and do all other needful and necessary acts.

Mr. METCALFE. I ask the present action of the House on the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let it be again reported.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that the resolution should be referred to the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I wish to say that as a member of the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings I did not assent to the recommendation that this resolution do pass. I do not wish to check any investigation which the majority of this House desire to set on foot-

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose it is understood that the point of order is reserved. I believe this is not a public report, such as the committee is entitled to make under this call.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I was saying that I do not wish to check any investigation which the majority of this House desire to set on foot, but I thought that such an investigation did not come within the purview of the proper duties of our committee. That is the only objection I have to the resolution.

Mr. HOSKINS. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee of Accounts.

mittee of Accounts

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I understand that this is a report from a

The SPEAKER. It is; but it is competent for the House to refer

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I desire to say that the sooner this investigation is made the better. I have no doubt at all that there has been very great fraud in the erection of the New York post-office.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] if he will not allow a comparative statement to be made of the cost of the new court-house and of the post-office, which are both on the same ground?

The question was taken on Mr. Hoskins's motion to refer the resolution to the Committee of Accounts; and on a division there were ayes 56, noes 67.

So the motion was not agreed to. The resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. METCALFE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CENTENNIAL COMMISSIONERS FOR TEXAS.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on the Centennial, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1749) authorizing the President to appoint two centennial commissioners for the State of Texas in lieu of those now acting.

The bill was read. It makes it the duty of the President of the United States, on the nomination of the governor of Texas, to appoint two commissioners for the State of Texas, to act in conjunction with the other commissioners of the centennial celebration; and upon their appointment the commissioners now acting shall be relieved from further duty.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon its passage.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would like to hear from the chairman of the committee in reference to this bill. This is an unusual procedure.

Mr. HOPKINS. I understand that the people of Texas are very anxious to be represented at this ceiebration, and that they desire to have commissioners who are identified with their interests and who will have the State wride to provide for the proper display of the will have the State pride to provide for the proper display of the products of Texas. The commissioner now in office is not and has not been for four or five years a citizen of Texas, and the object of this bill is simply to authorize the appointment of citizens of Texas to represent that State.

The bill was passed.

Mr. MILLS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LOCAL CENTENNIAL CELEBRATIONS.

Mr. HARDENBERGH, from the Committee on the Centennial Celebration, reported back, with amendments, joint resolution (H. R. No. 19) on the celebration of the Centennial in the several counties The joint resolution was read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That it be, and is hereby, recommended by the Senate and House of Representatives to the people of the several States that they assemble in their several counties on the approaching centennial anniversary of our national Independence, and that they cause to have delivered on such day a historical sketch of said county from its formation, and that a copy of said sketch may be filed, in print or manuscript, in the clerk's office of said county, and an additional copy, in print or manuscript, be filed in the office of the Librarian of Congress, to the intent that a complete record may thus be obtained of the progress of our institutions during the first centennial of their existence.

The amendments reported by the committee were to add after the word "counties" the words "or towns," and after the words "historical sketch of said county" the words "or town." The amendments, as amended, were agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The title of the joint resolution was amended so as to read: "Joint resolution on the celebration of the Centennial in the several counties and towns."

The question was on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. COCHRANE. I would like to have some explanation of that joint resolution and amendments.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I presume, Mr. Speaker, it will scarcely be considered necessary to encroach upon the time of the House in the advocacy of a resolution so simple and yet so just as this, and yet it is one whereby it is designed to add a most interesting feature in the celebration of our centennial year. While our people will flock in crowds to Philadelphia, it will yet be impossible for the vast majority of American citizens, scattered as they are over our immense domain, to attend at Philadelphia, who yet are anxious to revive the proper feelings of pride and patriotism which our centennial year evokes. It affords a fitting opportunity, by request of the National Legislature, to assemble within their own counties and towns, and in Legislature, to assemble within their own counties and towns, and in this manner to secure a more perfect history of our country than would otherwise be possibly secured. It appeals to no prejudice, it comprehends every section, and is without expense to the Government. The resolution passed the Centennial Committee by its unanimous consent, the only alteration having been made by the insertion of the word "towns," to suit some localities, and that the copy furnished for the Library of Congress may be either in manuscript or in print. Thus, sir, the celebration of our grand centennial year will indeed be national and its history written by the living actors in this grandest drama of history. I shall hope the joint resolution may pass by unanimous consent.

The joint resolution as amended was then passed.

Mr. HARDENBERGH moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to re-consider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CUSTODY OF INDIAN TRUST FUNDS.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2447) transferring the custody of certain Indian trust funds from the Secretary of the Interior to the Treasurer of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read in full, as follows:

The bill was read in full, as follows:

Beit enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assemb'ed, That all stocks, bonds, or other securities or evidences of indebtedness now held by the Secretary of the Interior in trust for the benefit of certain Indian tribes, shall, within thirty days from the passage of this act, be transferred to the Treasurer of the United States, who shall become the custodian thereof; and it shall be the duty of said Treasurer to collect all interest falling due on said bonds, stocks, &c., and deposit the same in the Treasury of the United States, and to issue certificates of deposit therefor in favor of the Secretary of the Interior, as trustee for various Indian tribes. And the Treasurer of the United States shall also become the custodian of all bonds and stocks which may be purchased for the benefit of any Indian tribe or tribes after the transfer of funds herein authorized, and shall make all purchases and sales of bonds and stocks authorized by treaty stipulations or by acts of Congress, when requested so to do by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That nothing in this act shall in any manner impair or affect the supervisory and appellate powers and duties in regard to Indian affairs which may now be vested in the Secretary of the Interior as trustee for various Indian tribes, except as to the custody of said bonds and the collection of interest thereon as hereinbefore mentioned.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engressed and read

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. FOSTER. The House will remember that early in the session Mr. FOSTER. The House will remember that early in the session the Committee on Appropriations reported a bill similar to this, which passed both Houses of Congress but was returned by the President without his approval. It is due to the Committee on Appropriations to state that their first action was based upon a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, which was referred to them, recommending the transfer of the custody of the Indian trust fund to the Treasury. That letter was accompanied with the draught of a bill prepared in the Interior Department. The matter was referred to me as a subcommittee, and I went to the Secretary of the Interior, and after consultation with him an amendment was added to the bill, and in the amended form it was reported to the House and passed. It seems however that the Secretary of the Interior had not so carefully scrutinized the bill as to provide that the interest on this trust fund should yet remain in his custody and control. For the reason set forth in his letter the bill was returned by the President without his approval. I ask the Clerk to read the letter of the Secretary of the Interior.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, February 2, 1876.

Washington, February 2, 1876.

Siz: I acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 29th ultimo, transmitting House bill No. 1531, and requesting this Department to report whether any objections to its becoming a law are known to exist.

In reply, I have the honor to state that I am fearful that the act is not sufficiently definite in terms to accomplish the end desired, namely, the mere transfer of the custody of said trust funds, enabling this Department to receive the interest from the custodian and apply it as heretofore without the intervention of Congress. The nature of the guardianship and control over the Indians, exercised by me as Secretary and trustee, is such as to require this Department to keep an account of the funds to their credit or held in trust for them, and to receive the interest customer than the sum of the funds of the f

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Secretary.

The PRESIDENT.

Mr. FOSTER. The bill now reported by the Committee on Approriations is the one referred to in the letter of the Secretary just read.

It accomplishes the purpose desired, and relates wholly and solely to the custody of the trust fund and nothing else.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FOSTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF RAILROAD COMPANIES.

Mr. KASSON. I am directed by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad to report back House bill No. 105, to amend the act entitled "An act relative to filing reports of railroad companies," approved June 25, 1868. There are many verbal amendments inserted in the bill, and for the purpose of saving time I ask that the bill with the verbal amendments be considered as an original bill.

There was no objection, and the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2448); which was read a first and second

Every corporation neglecting to make and furnish such report at the time and in the manner hereinbefore specified shall forfeit to the use of the United States of America the sum of $1,000 for each day's neglect, to be recovered by the Secretary of the Treasury; and if any corporation without just cause refuses or neglects to comply with the provisions of said section for the term of six months, it shall forfeit, for every such refusal or neglect, the sum of $500,000. And a continuous neglect or refusal by any corporation for the term of six months shall work a forfeiture of all its rights and franchises.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest an amendment to the bill  $\mathring{\tau}$

Mr. KASSON. In a moment. I suppose it is hardly necessary for me to say more in respect to this bill than that its object is to put into the possession of the Treasury Department annually all the statistical data necessary to secure an accurate estimate of the amount due the United States under the several acts relating to these railroads, and also to give an accurate basis for such additional legislation as from time to time may be needed for the public interest. The bill has been carefully considered by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad and, so far as I know, it is reported without objection on the part of any member of that committee. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Hoar.]

Mr. Hoar. I desire to move, with the consent of the gentleman reporting this bill, to amend by inserting, after the third clause of specifications relating to the amount of stock subscribed, the follow-

And how much thereof has been paid into the treasury of the company in cash; nd, if paid in any other mode, how said payment was made, with full details of such payments.

I suppose it is unnecessary to say that no method has ever been devised by which frauds have been more successfully practiced upon the community by railroad companies than the method of pretended payments into the treasury of the company on account of its stock; not cash payments, but some pretended equivalent, either in the way of construction contracts or in some other way. The very complete and admirable system of railroad report and accountability which this bill provides would be imperfect unless it requires an answer on the part of the company to the question whether the stock of the company has been paid in full in cash, or if not, what has been substituted for it.

Mr. KASSON. One of the amendments agreed to by the committee, and which has been read as part of the substitute, although it does not appear in the printed bill, is to add at the end of the sixteenth line these words:

The amount of stock subscribed or held by each and the amount paid in by each.

Now the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] proposes to add at the end of the twentieth line what is still more specific, (and I do add at the end of the twentieth line what is still more specific, (and I do not know that there is any just objection to it,) a provision that in addition to the statement already called for the company shall state in detail how much was paid in cash, and how much, if any, in any other form than cash. I yield that the amendment may be submitted to a vote, not having authority to accept it.

The amendment of Mr. Hoar was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. The bill, as reported by the committee, requires, I believe, that the statement to be filed by each of these companies shall be sworn to by the president of the company. Now I suggest whether it is not exceedingly desirable that this statement shall be attacted by it is not exceedingly desirable that this statement shall be attested by the president, the treasurer, and a majority of the board of directors of each company? This seems to be especially important, because sometimes, unfortunately, the managing officer of one of these roads may be an untrustworthy person; yet such an officer always seems to gain the confidence of the public by the fact that the board of directgain the connence of the public by the fact that the board of direct-ors, often gentlemen of the highest character, are supposed to super-vise and sanction the management. Hence it seems to me important that these statements, which are to be accepted as showing the con-dition of these companies, should be attested not only by the pres-ident, but by the treasurer and a majority of the board of direction. Such a certification is required in several of the States to statements of this kind.

Mr. KASSON. There is no objection to adding the words "and treasurer." He is the officer most intimately connected with the finances of each of these companies. But to require the sworn certificate of the majority of the directors in a corporation of this kind, of which the directors may be scattered over the continent, would probably cause much more difficulty and prove far less satisfactory than in the case of the States to which the gentleman refers.

I will yield to the gentleman for a motion to add "and treasurer" after the word "president" in the thirteenth line. That is as far as I think it advisable to go at this time.

Mr. HOAR. I will make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States—I think on Monday last-determined that the eastern terminus of the Union Pacific Railroad is to be on the Iowa shore of the Missouri River, opposite Omaha. Now I notice that this bill requires this company to make a report of its receipts for passing over the bridge across the Missouri at that point. As I understand the decision of the court, it

Missouri at that point. As I understand the decision of the court, it will be the duty of this company to pass over this bridge without any additional charge. I wish to inquire of the gentleman who reports this bill whether its language may not seem to imply a recognition of the right of the company to charge for passing over the bridge?

Mr. KASSON. Possibly the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] may not have had the opportunity to look over that opinion in writing, as I have done, though I was obliged to do it hastily. My impression is that the court does not decide in that opinion the question of the right under the appropriatory statute to lavy talks a right of pression is that the court does not decide in that opinion the question of the right under the amendatory statute to levy tolls, a right obtained by a specific statute. But this bill in no respect touches that question except that, if the right to levy tolls has ceased by virtue of that decision, we shall get only the report of what the company has received for the last year. Hence I think there can be no objection to the provision of the bill on this subject.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I suggest to the gentleman whether it would not be well to insert in the bill a provision of this sort:

And any railroad company failing to comply with any of the provisions of this act shall forfeit its rights, privileges, and franchises as a corporation, and may be proceeded against as for a forfeiture by the Attorney-General.

Of course this would leave it discretionary with the Attorney-General whether to proceed for a forfeiture or not. But there ought to be some very effectual mode of enforcing compliance with the provisions of this bill.

Mr. KASSON. I cannot yield for that amendment, because the committee definitely considered a proposition of the same kind, and decided in favor of the securities by very heavy penalties provided in the last clause of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs to say to the gentleman from Iowa that the bill is amendable at this stage without his leave.

Mr. KASSON. I am retaining the floor for the purpose of keeping control of the bill and moving the previous question before the morning hour expires, unless there is a desire on the part of the House to ing hour expires, unless there is a desire on the part of the House to offer general amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair prefers to assume always that that desire exists. Unless a gentleman demands the previous question when he takes the floor, it is much safer for the Chair to assume that the House retains its rights with reference to amendments.

Mr. KASSON. But the Chair will observe that I had the floor and was still on my feet hearing what gentlemen might suggest.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood.

Mr. KASSON. If no further amendments are proposed I will now move the previous question.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask an opportunity to offer the amendment I have indicated.

have indicated.

Mr. KASSON. To that I can only say that the committee unanimously prefer the security already provided in the last clause of the bill; and if the House prefers that, it will vote down the motion of the gentleman.

Mr. LAWRENCE. This is a cumulative remedy; it does not exclude any other remedy provided in the bill.

Let me say to the gentleman from Iowa and to the House that the remedy provided for in this bill may be of no value at all. You canremedy provided for in this bill may be of no value at all. You cannot collect a debt against these companies unless they choose to pay, for the reason that they have mortgaged their franchises as well as their lands and everything else, until you cannot collect a dollar off of them unless they choose voluntarily to pay. Yet, if you reserve the right to proceed against these companies as for forfeiture, they may prefer to pay rather than incur that risk of forfeiture. It is for that reason I have desired to offer the amendment. It will not take from the Government the right to pursue the remedies suggested by the gentleman from Iowa. If permitted, I will move the amendment to come in at the end of the bill.

Mr. KASSON. I do not yield for that amendment. I yield now for a few minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Hoar.]

a few minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Hoar.]
The SPEAKER. Did not the gentleman from Iowa yield for an amendment of the gentleman from Ohio some time ago which has not yet been voted on?

Mr. KASSON. I have not yielded for the offering of any amendment, but I do yield now to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, the railroad policy of this country, as adopted by Congress, seems to be one of the least creditable parts of our legislative history. We have passed these great charters, which ought to have been as carefully considered as any of the constitutions of the States—which are to be as important and permanent—without requiring any considerable safe-guards to the people, to the public, or in some cases to the railroads themselves. Then we rushed blindly to the other extreme, and undertook to put upon them the most unreas-onable and intolerable burdens. This amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is one of that kind. Here is a railroad company required to make its annual report, containing a large number of details, and to make its annual report, containing a large number of details, and the committee proposes in addition a penalty for every day's delay, and a penalty of $500,000 in case of an actual contumacy. That is a pretty severe penalty, is it not? If that is not enough, Congress can at any time repeal the charter or deal with the delinquent railroad within its control. In addition, the gentleman from Ohio proposes to have the franchise ipso facto forfeited, so that every widow or orphan whose property is invested in the stock of the railroad company, who cannot control the action of the board of directors, every mortgages cannot control the action of the board of directors, every mortgagee under a lawful mortgage, all are to have their entire property cut up by the roots, and the public are to be deprived of the convenience of railroad transportation and connection. Why, sir, it is like decapi-tating a man for neglecting to black your boots.

Mr. LAWRENCE. What is that?

Mr. HOAR. The disproportion between the offence and the penalty is as great as to decapitate a man for neglecting to black your boots in the morning.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman yield to me for one moment?

Mr. KASSON. For one remark only.
Mr. LAWRENCE. My amendment does not ipso facto work a forfeiture. It only renders the corporations liable to be proceeded against as for forfeiture. If the company will comply with the law, then there will be no forfeiture. Violation of the law now operates as forfeiture, and yet it does not destroy the mortgages.

Mr. CROUNSE. I rise to the question of order that the discussion now going on is not to any question pending. The morning hour is near out, and I hope the bill will be pressed to a passage.

Mr. KASSON. One word of explanation and then I will demand the previous question. The committee had before them the proposithe previous question. The committee had before them the proposition of extreme forfeiture for failure to comply as was required. It must be recollected we require a great many things of these railroad companies. The committee itself thought they might without fault on their part be guilty of a day's neglect, or several days' neglect, and we proposed ample penalty for such neglect without forfeiting the franchise. Again, if the gentleman's forfeiture is worth anything to secure the provisions of this bill, then the company has something upon which the fine can be levied. If their franchises are forfeited, they are not left anything open to execution upon forfeiture. His argument defeats itself. The committee, I believe, were unanimous in saying and thinking, and so reported, that the forfeiture of all these vast interests under the existing law was complicating an existing system to an extent they were not willing to undertake. We have imposed heavy penalties, and the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific are amply able to pay those penalties, the stock of one being at cific are amply able to pay those penalties, the stock of one being at par, while that of the other approximates it. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman who reported the bill whether the present law authorizes the companies to charge for transportation of passengers and freight across the Missouri River between Council Bluffs and Omaha?

Mr. KASSON. That was done by virtue of the special act of Congress to which I have alluded; and, without further examination of the opinion of the Supreme Court, I am not prepared to say it has been done away with.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. The clause on page 6 seems to recognize the right of the companies to charge for this transportation. If it has already been granted, I do not see objection to the clause.

Mr. KASSON. The committee have a bill before them regulating that. We are only waiting for further information before reporting it. This does nothing but require a copy for this year in case it is abolished; if it continues, they have to continue to make report. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and multiply the correction thereof the bill was ordered to be appropriated.

and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KASSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

WILLIAM P. STOWE.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the petition of William P. Stowe, chaplain of the Twenty-seventh Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, for relief; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PORT OF ENTRY AND DELIVERY AT WEST POINT, VIRGINIA.

Mr. KEHR, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 13) to es-tablish a port of entry and delivery at the town of West Point, Virginia; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-HOUSE, ETC., ON STANNARD'S ROCK.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 959) to appropriate money for the erection of a light-house and steam fog-signal on Stannard's Rock, Lake Superior, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

STEAM FOG-SIGNAL AT LITTLE TRAVERSE BAY.

Mr. PIERCE also, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (E. R. No. 931) to appropriate money for the erection of a station and steam fog-signal at Little Traverse Bay, Michigan, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The call having reached the Committee on Public Lands, Mr. CROUNSE said: Mr. Speaker, has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. CROUNSE. The Committee on Public Lands has considerable business to report, and as we are not willing to enter on a fractional art of an hour, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired. What is the cleasure of the House?

Mr. PAGE. Is there not a special order for to-day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware of any.

Mr. PAGE. Was not the bill relating to the Hawaiian treaty made the special order for to-day?

The SPEAKER. That is a special order for to-morrow.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at one o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 2, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved. PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. McMILLAN presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of the passage of an act for the relief of settlers on certain lands in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A joint resolution requesting our Senators and Representatives in Congress to pro-cure the passage of an act for the relief of settlers upon certain lands in the State of Minnesota.

Whereas large numbers of citizens of this State have in good faith settled upon and made or acquired valuable improvements on tracts of land included within the granted and indemnity limits of the land granted to the Brainard and Saint Vincent branches or extensions of the Saint Paul and Pacific Railroad Company, and are unable under existing laws to perfect title thereto; and whereas justice demands that those citizens should be protected in their homes and property so made and acquired, and the material interests of a large and deserving class secured and preserved: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives, (the senate concurring.) That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use all honorable means in their power to procure at the earliest possible time the passage of a law by Congress which will allow such persons or their representatives to secure and perfect title to such lands.

EULOGIES ON VICE-PRESIDENT WILSON.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred a similar resolution in regard to eulogies on the late Vice-President, to report it back with certain amendments.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Printing were in line 5 to strike out "9" and insert "8," and in line 6 to strike out "3" and insert "4;" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved by the House of Representaties, (the Senate concurring,) That 12,000 copies of the eulogies delivered in the two Houses of Congress upon the late Vice-President, Henry Wilson, be printed; 8,000 copies for the use of the House and 4,000 copies for the use of the Senate; and the Secretary of the Treasury have printed the portrait of Mr. Wilson to accompany the same.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Isaac Stroum, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 2448) to amend the act entitled "An act relative to filing reports of railroad companies," approved June 25, 1868;

A bill (H. R. No. 1749) authorizing the President to appoint two centennial commissioners for the State of Texas in lieu of those now acting

A bill (H. R. No. 2447) transferring the custody of certain Indian trust funds; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 19) on the celebration of the centennial in the several counties.

PORT OF GENESEE.

Mr. CONKLING. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2282) to extend to the port of Genesee, in the State of New York, the privileges of sections 2900 to 2997 of the Revised Statutes, inclusive, to report the same back without amendment and with a recommendation that it pass. Time is of some consequence about this matter, and thinking as I do that there will be no objection to it, I ask that it be read for information, and if there shall then be no objection, I will ask that it be considered now.

The bill was read.

The bill was read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to hear an explanation of that bill.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Ohio indicates, very naturally, that he would like to know what this bill means. Of course he cannot tell merely by the numbers of the sections being referred to in the text of the bill; and therefore I beg to state that, first, there is among the papers a written report from the House committee and there is also a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, and they are both in general terms to this effect: By the sections of the Revised Statutes referred to in the bill certain ports, a good many in number, are designated as those from which merchandise may go on under certain conditions and limitations to certain other ports named, they also tain conditions and limitations to certain other ports named, they also tain conditions and limitations to certain other ports named, they also being numerous.

The port of Genesee is at the mouth of the Genesee River, five or six miles from Rochester. The city of Rochester is a considerable city, as Senators may know, much larger than the cities concerned in some of the other instances. The effect of the bill is simply to make this port of Genesee, thereby in effect meaning the city of Rochester, one of the places standing upon the footing on which so many other places stand; and the Secretary of the Treasury says in substance that there being this large city within the collection district, he sees no reason why this port should not be one of those to which I refer. The particular point—perhaps I should state that—is that merchandise received at the port to go to another port need not be overhauled and examined at this first port mentioned, to wit the intermediate port. examined at this first port mentioned, to wit the intermediate port, so that merchandise coming to that port and going on need not be brought up to the city of Rochester five or six miles, there to undergo what it would undergo were it to stop there, but being bonded go what it would undergo were it to stop there, but being bonded and treated as the statutes require, it may proceed on its way, as it does now in the case of San Francisco, New York, Boston, Portland, and so on not only, but also in the case of Mobile and a considerable number of inland and lesser ports.

If the Senator from Ohio still has any doubt about the bill, the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury is very brief, and perhaps he might like to hear that read.

Mr. SHERMAN. The statement of the Senator from New York shows the importance of this bill; and if he will read, as I have no doubt he has read the sections here referred to, he would see how much more important it is than an ordinary bill to extend facilities to a particular port.

Mr. CONKLING. I have read them carefully."

Mr. SHERMAN. The trouble is that some years ago in the modification of our customs laws we allowed goods to be transported from ports of entry, like the city of New York, to ports of delivery without examination or inspection, and without appraisement. If that bill had been confined to the cities of Saint Louis, Cincinnati, and Chicago, cities of secondary importance, it would have been a very wise bill; but it was unwisely extended to cities of lesser character, but still important and flourishing towns like Louisville, Cleveland, Detroit, and other places, and it has largely added to the expenses of our customs service. Now, Buffalo is a port of entry and a port of delivery, and goods may be transferred from New York to Buffalo with-out appraisement, without identification or examination. Buffalo is within one hundred miles of Rochester. It seems to me it is very doubtful whether we ought to add the port of Rochester, for that is the substance of it, Genesee being substantially the port of Rochester, and being so near Buffalo, and I assure the Senator from New York that if this bill passes we cannot resist the applications which will be made by other cities as important as Rochester for these priv-

Mr. CONKLING. How many such cities are there?

Mr. SHERMAN. I know there are some that the Secretary has recommended should be discontinued. This bill involves the necessity of new officers, as I suppose the Senator is aware—at least an appraiser of merchandise. It will be necessary, when this bill passes, to have an appraiser of merchandise at the port of Genesee, because there the goods must be inspected, examined, identified, and appraised. The result is that much complication and much dispute have already The result is that much complication and much dispute have already arisen. The Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, or some leading body of that city, has already complained that by reason of the diversity of appraisal in the different ports of the United States the commerce of New York has been greatly injured. That complaint has been made against the city of Baltimore. They say that under the operation of this transfer law goods are transported through New York and appraised at Baltimore and other ports, and that the rule of appraisement adopted in these interior ports is more favorable to the appraisement adopted in these interior ports is more favorable to the importer; that is, the appraisement is less than it is in New York; and New York is already complaining of the operation of this law upon her own commerce.

Now, sir, while I will not object to this bill further than to ask that it may lie over until to-morrow, I call the attention of the Senator from New York and also of other Senators to the importance of opening the door to the enlargement of the ports under this law. own opinion has been that some of these ports ought to be stricken off rather than have the list enlarged, and I think it my duty to object to the consideration of the bill to-day. Let it stand over until to-morrow.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, it would not be sincere in me to contest with the Senator from Ohio or anybody else such criticisms as he has made upon the propriety of the original legislation on this subject. I have nothing to say about it. I had nothing to say in its favor at the time. It was one of my regrets when the legislation to which the Senator refers was urged upon us that those of us who attempted in vain to resist it were without the support of the honorable Senator from Ohio and without the impression which would have ble Serator from Ohio and without the impression which would have been made upon the country had he then given us the caution which he has found occasion since to think wholesome on this subject. But the Senator from Ohio, like other Senators on both sides some of whom are not here, was at that time very urgent indeed that Toledo, Ohio, for example, and various other places which here are stated, should be put upon a special footing as ports. Now the honorable Senator from Ohio says, and I think he is quite right, that the Secretary of the Treasury, or at all events his predecessor, finds in that list more than one place which he thinks should be stricken from it; but the Secretary of the Treasury finds that in this particular case this port, in his judgment, should be added to it.

The Senator from Ohio says that the addition of this port will increase the expense of officers, and I want to consider that objection for one moment. A Senator near me suggests that that, if it were true, was true of all these other cases, as undoubtedly it was; but in this case, equipped as this port is, the report of the House committee, of which the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury is a part, makes this observation:

There is no increase of expenditure to the Government and will be none by the passage of this bill.

The Secretary of the Treasury says:

The sections of law referred to permit merchandise imported at various designated ports to be shipped to various other ports without examination or appraisement at the port of first arrival. In view of the fact that the city of Rochester is situated within the limits of the collection district of Genesce, and that the custom-house is located at that place, I know of no good reason why the bill in question should not become a law. It is suggested, however, that a verbal alteration should be made.

The first of the sections of the statutes which the bill seeks to apply to the port in question provides:

When any merchandise, except wine, distilled spirits, and perishable or explosive articles, or articles in bulk, imported at the ports of New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Baltimore, Portland in Maine, Port Huron, Detroit, New Orleans, Toledo, and San Francisco, shall appear by the invoice or bill of lading and by the manifest to be consigned to and destined for either of the ports specified in section 2997, the collector at the port of arrival shall permit the owner, agent, or consignee to make entry thereof for warehouse or immediate transportation, in triplicate, setting forth the particulars in such entry and the route by which such merchandise is to be forwarded, whether by land or water. The entry having been compared with the invoice and duly sworn to, and such an examination of the merchandise having been made as will satisfy the customs officers that the same corresponds with the manifest and invoice, and the duties estimated on the value and quantity of the invoice, and on the execution of a bond as hereinafter provided, the collector shall deliver the same to be immediately transported to such port of destination, at the sole cost and risk of such owner, agent, or consignee.

The other sections merely provide the modus operandi until you reach the last section to which the bill refers, and there is an enumeration of the ports to which the destination must be. I have read this section of the statutes in the light of the request of the Senator from Ohio that the bill lie over, in order that the section may appear in the RECORD and in the hope that Senators, if they deem it worth while to do so, may look at it in order to see, as I think they must, while to do so, may look at it in order to see, as I think they must, that if this legislation is to stand and stand applicable to places where confessedly the argument whatever it may be is obviously weaker than it is in this case, we shall not refuse to apply it in an instance where not only a considerable city but I might say a great city is five or six miles removed from the track in which the merchandise may be going, so as to compel a removal of the merchandise that distance to and fro in order to undergo an examination and a ceremony which, in respect of lesser places involving comparatively trifling inconvenience, Congress has said was unnecessary and unwise.

As I said before, I have no plea to make for this legislation, but I have something to say for equality, at all events against that inequality which picks out an instance of marked hardship and taboos that as one that shall not be included within the facilities afforded

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to ascertain from the Senator whether the act that he read applies simply to goods imported from abroad for consumption in our own territory, or whether it applies to another class of goods that are imported with a view of transport across our territory to be consumed in another territory.

Mr. CONKLING. I understand that it applies to the former. It applies to goods which come to the port of Genesee destined further on.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The reason I make that inquiry particand the state of similar character, applicable as I understand to the other class of goods, was introduced by the Senator on one occasion and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can tell the Senator from Maine that that has

mr. Shekman. I can ten the Senator from Maine that has nothing to do with this case. These goods, like any other goods that are imported, may be re-exported.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is under a general law.

Mr. CONKLING. That is another matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. The case of goods being introduced through our

Mr. SHERMAN. The case of goods being introduced through our country in bond for a foreign exportation is not provided for in this law. I certainly do not wish to make that discrimination. My remark was confined to a general caution against extending the provisions of this law. I not only favored the law, as the honorable Senator from New York suggests, but I introduced it and urged it very strongly, and I believe it is right; I believe the principle of it is right; but it ought to be confined to four or five great interior ports. It does not affect the commerce of the country so far as our exterior ports are concerned like Portland or Boston or Providence. exterior ports are concerned, like Portland, or Boston, or Providence, or any of those places. It is perfectly right that goods coming to New York should be shipped to all those ports without examination at the port of New York. There could be no objection to the naming of those places; but in the interior ports of the country there are instances of goods slipping out without paying duties. The Senator from New York objected to this law and opposed it strongly when it was introduced, I remember very well. The only answer was that it was a matter of primary importance to the interior cities of the country to have the benefits of the direct importation of goods; and I will say now that Chicago and Saint Louis and Cincinnati import an enormous quantity of goods. I have not the statistics before me, or I could show the Senate that the operation of this law in enabling these large interior cities to share in the direct trade has been of great benefit to the country without being any injury to the city of New York or any other place; but it is going too far to extend it to other points. Some of those named in the law I think ought not to have been introduced in the law, as Memphis, and perhaps Toledo, have been introduced in the law, as Memphis, and perhaps Toledo, Ohio, although there were good reasons for inserting Toledo at the time. Other points might properly be stricken from the law; but if you name the port of Genesee, which is the port of Rochester, as a matter of course you introduce a port within one hundred miles of Buffalo, which is already provided for by the law.

But the bill goes over until to-morrow. I do not want to make any discrimination.

Mr. CONKLING. I give notice that I will call it up to-morrow if I get the opportunity.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 546) to further the administration of justice in the State of Colorado; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 548) for the relief of the heirs of Major D.

C. Smith; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOOTH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 549) to relinquish the title of the United States introduce a bill (S. No. 549) to relinquish the title of the United States to certain property in the city and county of San Francisco, California; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 550) in reference to certain entries of land under the homestead law; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 551) for the completion of the custom-house at Parkersburgh, West Virginia, and to furnish the same; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DAVIS. The custom-house there now is about half completed, and great damage will result to it unless some appropriation is made by this Congress. I move that the bill be referred to the appropriate committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

Mr. DAVIS. The Committee on Appropriations, I think. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

On motion of Mr. KERNAN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Samuel H. Leavitt be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

E. RUMSEY WING.

Mr. McCREERY. I rise for the purpose of calling up the bill which I gave notice on yesterday I would move to proceed to the consideration of this morning. I move now to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 382.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 382) to appropriate $1,000 to remove the remains of Hon. E. Rumsey Wing, late minister to Ecuador, from Quito to the cemetery at Louisville, Kentucky, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Foreign Relations reported the bill with an amendment to strike out "Louisville" and insert "Owensborough."

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. McCREERY. Mr. President, I have little to say in addition to what I said on Tuesday. The death of Hon. E. Rumsey Wing was a misfortune to his State and to the country at large. Nature had endowed him with superior capabilities and cultivation had prepared him for a brilliant career on any theater of human action. Young as he was, he has left the impress of his genius on the archives of the State Department. The five volumes of his official correspondence bear testimony to his indefatigable industry in extending our commerce and in opening new markets for our agricultural and mechanical productions, while as a lawyer, a soldier, and a gentleman his reputation was without a blemish. He has fallen at his post in the active discharge of his duty. The father asks that you will give back his son, and the widowed wife pleads before you for the lifeless body of her husband.

I did not expect that any question would arise as to the circumstances of the deceased; but since it has come up, I will state again that I do not believe he was the owner or possessor of any estate whatever. He had his salary, to be sure; but from the generosity of his character and his liberal patronage of the fine arts it is not likely that the remnant would be sufficient for the removal of his remains even if the Congress of the United States should exact his last far-thing for the purpose. I know of what I speak, and I say that I do not think his entire estate would be sufficient for the transportation of his body from Ecuador to Kentucky. I hope there will be no further objection to the appropriation.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read

The title was amended by changing "Louisville" to "Owensborough."

WILLIAM L. NANCE.

Mr. COOPER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 309.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 309) for the relief of William L. Nance was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $6,000, in full compensation for certain property of William L. Nance taken for the use of the Government of the United States during the late rebellion.

full compensation for certain property of William L. Nance taken for the use of the Government of the United States during the late rebellion.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Is there a report with the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. Jones, of Florida, from the Committee on Claims, on the 20th of January:
The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the claim of William L. Nance, of Nashville, Tennessee, having considered the same, report as follows:

The claimant in this case, in the year 1854, was the owner of a barrel factory and saw-mill, with their appurtenances, situated near Nashville, Tennessee. There were some twenty small houses crected near the factory, which were occupied by the employes of the factory. The property was purchased by the claimant for the sum of $40,000 in the year 1859, and at the time it was seized by the Government was in a good state of preservation.

In the year 1864 this property was taken for the use of the United States by order of Major-General G. H. Thomas, and appropriated by the officers in charge of the military railroads near Nashville. The buildings were all torn down and the machinery removed, which caused the entire breaking up of the claimant's business. The property was valued at the time at what it was worth to the Government for the special uses for which it was taken. The lumber in the buildings was valued at $25 per thousand feet, and the machinery of the factory and saw-mill was valued according to the ordinary standard of prices for such articles when not in use for any special purpose. It seems that the cost of putting the machinery in place in the factory and mill, or the value of the property as a whole, was not considered. All the witnesses examined place the value of the property at over $30,000. The claimant received $15,744.63, according to the valuation made at the time of the seizure. Afterward, in the year 1865, at the request of the claimant, Major-General Thomas o

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN S. WALKER.

Mr. KELLY. I ask the favor of the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 199 and pass it this morning. It is a short bill. I move to take

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 199) for the relief of the estate of the late paymaster, Major John S. Walker, United States Army, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It distances of the Treasury to credit the accounts of the rects the proper officers of the Treasury to credit the accounts of the late John S. Walker, paymaster, (who was lost while in the discharge of his official duty on the steamer George S. Wright, which was lost at sea near Cape Caution, on the coast of Alaska, in February, 1873,) with the sum of $2,124.98, which he had in his possession and was lost with him, and also the further sum of $427.73, of balances charged to his account, which, on account of loss of papers, cannot now be explained.

Mr. KELLY. I shall make no remarks on the bill except simply to call for the reading of the report of the committee. That explains and the further sum of $427.73, have duly considered the same, and beg leave to report:

That Major John S. Walker, paymaster United States Army, left Portland, Oregon, January 2, 1873, under orders to pay troops at Camp San Juan Island, and Sitka, Alaska, on muster of December 31, 1872.

He paid at the points named, and left Sitka, returning, January 21, 1873, by the steamer George S. Wright. This steamer was last seen at sea at noon of January 25, and is supposed to have been wrecked off Cape Caution January 27, with loss of all and everything on board. The remains of Major Walker were found in 1875, cast up by the sea, on an island in Bazan Bay. All of his papers, vouchers, &c., relating to payments made during this his last tour of duty were lost with him. Upon the receipt of information of his death, steps were taken by the Paymaster-General's Department to obtain from the posts visited by him certified copies of the vouchers paid and certified lists of soldiers' deposits received by him, from which, and from papers left by him at Portland, a final account-current was prepared and rendered in his name. From this account-current was prepared and rendered in his name. From this account-current was a balance of $2,124.98 left in his hands.

It is almost absolutely certain that this amount of $2,124.98 was in money on his person when shipwrecked, and lost with him. From this account there is also a balance against him of $427.73, made up of little balances, errors, &c., in his accounts from 1867 up to December 31, 1572. This last amount is principally made up of credits taken by the paymaster in excess of the sums covered by his vouchers, and is not susceptible of exact explanation.

The Secretary of War and Paymaster-General recommend that the bill be passed. Your committee recommend the passage of the bill referred to them, herewith returned.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, this claim was referred to me as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and I made a thorough examination into all the facts which could be obtained in reference to it. I consulted with the Secretary of War and the Paymaster-General and got all these accounts furnished to me. There can be no question that the balance of $2,124.98 was on the person of Major Walker at the time of his shipwreck, and lost with him. His body was afterward found in 1875. The other little balance of $427.73 is made up of items running from 1867 to 1872, and the report of the Paymaster-General shows these various items. They are mere errors in addition and subtraction which had been made, sometimes amounting to six cents in one place, twenty-five cents in another, and so on, for a series of years in the payments that he made. It would be almost impossible for the exact cause of these matters to be explained. most impossible for the exact cause of these matters to be explained. Major Walker was an excellent officer. His estate now stands charged with the $2,124.98 which was lost on his person by the shipwreck, and also stands charged with these other balances amounting in all to $427.73. The Committee on Military Affairs, indorsing the recommendation of the Secretary of War and the Paymaster-General, think that the estate of Major Walker should be credited with these amounts, and I hope that the bill will be passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EZRA B. BARNETT.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move to take up for consideration House bill No.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 193) for the relief of Ezra B. Barnett, postmaster at Norwich, New York, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for crediting with $95 the account of Ezra B. Barnett, postmaster at Norwich, New York, that being the amount of surplus money-order funds mailed by him September 29, 1874, for deposit with the postmaster at Binghamton, New York, the money having been burned and destroyed with the mail-car containing it, on the route to Binghamton, without the fault

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed by a two-thirds vote. Its title was amended by inserting the word "political" before "disabilities."

RUTH ELLEN GREELAUD.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1596.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1596) granting a pension to Ruth Ellen Greelaud was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to place the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ruth Ellen Greelaud, widow of John H. Greelaud, late a captain in the Army of the United States.

Mr. INGALLS. I think the bill should be amended by adding a clause at the end "to take effect from and after the passage of the act." That is a customary clause, and I see it has been omitted in this bill.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired. Mr. EDMUNDS. As I had the floor last night, and I am not feeling particularly well this morning, I rise to ask the general consent of the Senate to allow the unfinished business of yesterday to lie over until to morrow with a general understanding that it be taken up to-morrow as the unfinished business, so as not to lose its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this understanding? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MORTON. What is the proposition?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That the unfinished business of yesterday be postponed until to-morrow, to come up to-morrow the same as to-day as unfinished business

Mr. MORTON. I have no objection to accommodate the Senator from Vermont; but I have been informed that one or two Senators are about to go away to-night. That is the only objection that I could have. If the Senator from Vermont is not able to speak to-day, of

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not press the matter to-day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not prepose that it should be the unfinished business to-morrow if any person is going away; but merely as I supposed in the interest of the Senator from Indiana to keep the question before the Senate. If it should not be agreeable to him to have it proceeded with to-morrow, I should not object to its going over to another day

Mr. MORTON. The only objection I have to the postponement is the one I suggest. If Senators were not going away I should make no objection to the request of the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposi-tion of the Senator from Vermont, that the pending unfinished busi-ness go over to to-morrow and be considered the unfinished business after the morning hour to-morrow? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MORTON. I will state in this connection that if to-morrow
Senators are absent in consequence of this delay to-day, it may be laid over again until they return.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will take notice of the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana.

THE FINANCES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to give notice that on Monday I shall ask an opportunity to trespass on the attention of the Senate for a short time in regard to the propositions contained in the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, presented the other day by the Senator from New York. I give notice now merely, that if it does not interfere with the current business I shall call up on Monday the resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of New York.

Mr. BOGY. I desire to give notice that on Monday I will call up a bill germane to the matter spoken of by the Senator from Ohio, and address the Senate on that proposition, which I introduced early in the session.

ELIZABETH B. THOMAS.

Mr. WITHERS. I move to take up for present consideration Senate bill No. 431.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 431) granting a sension to Elizabeth B. Thomas, widow of General Lorenzo Thomas, pension to Elizabeth B. Thomas, widow of General Lorenzo Thomas, late of the United States Army, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth B. Thomas, widow of Lorenzo Thomas, late a brigadier-general of the Army of the United States, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month from and after the passage of the act.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM L. SCRUGGS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I have a letter from Mr. Thornton, the English minister, in relation to services performed by Mr. Scruggs, with a joint resolution which I present and ask for the immediate consideration of.

mediate consideration of.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 9) authorizing Hon. William L. Scruggs, United States minister at Bogota, to accept a present from the Queen of Great Britain. It authorizes William L. Scruggs, United States minister at Bogota, to accept a silver inkstand, with a suitable inscription, from the Queen of Great Britain, as a testimonial of her appreciation, from the Queen of Great Britain, as a testimonial of her appreciation of the privilege of the British arbitrator in an important page. ciation of his services as the British arbitrator in an important case between British subjects and the government of Colombia.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask the Secretary to read the letter of the British minister, which explains the subject fully.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, January 31, 1876.

Washington, January 31, 1876.

Sir: In compliance with an instruction which I have received from the Earl of Derby, I have the honor to inform you that a long-pending claim, brought by Messirs, Cottesworth and Powell, British subjects, against the government of Colombia, has lately been decided at Bogota, by reference to arbitration, a large sum having been awarded to the claimants. This satisfactory result is, in the opinion of Her Majesty's minister at Bogota, in very great measure to be attributed to the able and assiduous manner in which Hon. W. L. Seruggs, minister resident of the United States in Bogota, has discharged the duties of British arbitrator.

In these circumstances, his lordship has instructed me to request you to be good enough to convey to Mr. Scruggs the thanks of Her Majesty's government for the zeal and ability shown by him in assisting in the settlement of a British claim, and to add that Her Majesty's government proposes to beg the acceptance by Mr. Scruggs of a silver inkstand, with a suitable inscription, as a testimonial of the high sense which it entertains of his friendly and disinterested conduct in undertaking the laborious office of arbitrator.

Her Majesty's government hopes that the Government of the United States will not object to the acceptance by Mr. Scruggs of the proposed testimonial.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your obedient servant, EDWARD THORNTON.

Hon. HAMILTON FISH, &c.

The joint resolution was read three times, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by U. S. Grant, jr., his Secretary, announced that he had, on the 2d of March, approved and signed the act (S. No. 261) to remove the political disabilities of Daniel T. Chandler, of Baltimore, Maryland.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2448) to amend the act entitled "An act relative to filing reports of railroad companies," approved June 25, 1868, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

The bill (H. R. No. 1749) authorizing the President to appoint two centennial commissioners for the State of Texas in lieu of those now acting was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations

The bill (H. R. No. 2447) transferring the custody of certain Indian trust funds was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 19) on the celebration of the Centennial in the several counties or towns was read twice by its title.

Mr. HOWE. I think if that resolution can be reported at length

Mr. HOWE. I think if that resolution can be reported at length there will be no objection to agreeing to it at once. It is really one that a committee can do the Senate no good by considering.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It recommends on behalf of the Senate and House of Representatives that the people of the several States assemble in their several counties or towns on the approaching centennial anniversary of our national independence, and that they cause to have delivered on said day a historical sketch of such county or town from its formation, and that a copy of the sketch may be filed in print or manuscript in the clerk's office of the sketch may be filed in print or manuscript in the clerk's office of the county and an additional copy in print or manuscript in the office of the Librarian of Congress, to the intent that a complete record may thus be obtained of the progress of our institutions during the first centennial of their existence.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill which was laid aside yesterday at the time that the Pinchback case was taken up, being the bill (8. No. 60) declaring the true intent and meaning of the Union Pacific Railroad acts approved July 1, 1862, July 2, 1864, and July 3, 1866, and for other purposes. I wish to say to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Ingalls] that if he is not prepared to go on to-day I shall not insist upon the consideration of the bill. I trust that there will be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. With a desire to promote the public business and avoid conflicts for the floor, I suggest that we now take up the Calendar under what is called the Anthony rule, subject to objection.

dar under what is called the Anthony rule, subject to objection. In that way we may dispose of quite a number of bills and have no struggle about the order of business. This is a lost day at any rate, and we might as well take up and dispose of the bills on the Calendar to we might as well take up and dispose of the bills on the Calendar to which objection may not be made.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to taking up the Calendar under what is known as the Anthony rule, by which each bill is subject to a single objection? The Chair hears none.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 138) to increase the efficiency of the Navy and to promote the maritime interests of the United States.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Massachusetts who introduced that bill [Mr. BOUTWELL] is not in his seat. I suppose perhaps it

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not object to the bill, but suggest that it be

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

HEIRS OF JAMES H. CARLETON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. N. 63) granting relief to Eva, Etta, Henry, and Guy Carleton, heirs of General James H. Carleton, deceased.

The bill was read.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is there a report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no report with the bill, as the Chair is informed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think we ought to pass such a bill without a report.

Mr. WRIGHT. There is a report in the case. I wish to say in reference to this case, if I can have the attention of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] that it was called up during the morning hour, some time since, and the Senator from Vermont at that time suggested some objections to the allowance of the claim. He then pointed out one difficulty in the report that seemed to him to be in the way of the allowance of the claim. Subsequently he and I were both satisfied that there was a mistake in reference to a date. He, however, suggested that there was perhaps another difficulty, and, following his request, I referred the matter to the War Office and have not yet had an answer. I believe myself that the claim is right and entirely correct; but I deem it proper to state the fact that I have referred the matter and have not yet had an answer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then it is better that it should go over until we get the information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.
Mr. SHERMAN. I call attention to the fact that there is no report on file or noted on the Calendar.
Mr. WRIGHT. There is a report on file. A report was made at the last session, and there is no new report, but the old report was adopted.

Mr. SHERMAN. It ought to be so marked on the Calendar. Mr. DAVIS. I notice that the bill calls for interest. That is very

Mr. WRIGHT. The committee amend the bill in that respect. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid over.

FRANCES A. ROBINSON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 237) for the relief of Frances A. Robinson, administratrix of the estate of John M. Robinson, deceased; which was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment to Frances A. Robinson, administratrix of the estate of John M. Robinson, late of Independence, Missouri, deceased, $2,000, in full for the use and occupation of the foundery of the deceased, and property taken therefrom for the use of the United States Army, during the years 1862 and 1863.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for the reading of the report.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. MITCH-ELL from the Committee on Claims on the 12th of January:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Frances A. Robinson, administratrix of John M. Robinson, late of Independence, State of Missouri, deceased, having had the same under consideration, beg to submit the following re-inson, administratrix of John M. Robinson, late of Independence, State of Missouri, deceased, having had the same under consideration, beg to submit the following report:

The petitioner avers in her petition that she is the widow and administratrix of John M. Robinson, deceased; that, for some time previous to the war of the rebellion, and at the commencement thereof, said John M. Robinson resided in the city of Independence, in the State of Missouri; that he was the owner of a foundery situated in that city; that such foundery was at the beginning of the late war completely furnished with all the machinery, fixtures, and appurtenances necessary for its operation, and was operated by said Robinson until he was compelled to close it or cast cannon-shot for the rebels; that he refused to submit to this latter alternative, and, being loyal to the Government of the United States, he closed his foundery, and became a soldier in the Fifth Regiment of Missouri State Militia, commanded by Colonel William R. Pennick, which regiment was mustered into the service of the United States; that, while he was serving as a soldier in this regiment, said Colonel William R. Pennick took possession of his said foundery, and used it as a cavalry-yard for the horses of his regiment, and used the tools and iron for shoeing the said horses; that all the machinery, fixtures, patterns, &c., in said foundery were removed or destroyed by the soldiers under command of said officer, and were wholly lost to their owner; that he, John M. Robinson, used every possible effort to prevent this destruction of his property, but without avail; and that the property thus destroyed or carried away was worth from $1,000 to $20,000.

These are substantially the statements contained in the petition. There are numerous affidavits on file, from which it appears that said John M. Robinson was the owner of a foundery located in Independence and was operating the same at the commencement of the war; that he was loyal to the Government, and closed his foundery

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the amount allowed?
Mr. MITCHELL. I will state that a bill for $2,500 passed the House last year, and the Senate amended it by substituting $2,000. This allows $2,000.

Mr. HOWE. I will ask the Senator from Oregon if there have not been some reports against this claim?

Mr. MITCHELL. Not that I am aware of. I am pretty confident

Mr. MITCHELL. Not that I am aware of. I am pretty confident there has never been any report against it.

Mr. HOWE. I do not remember the history of it.

Mr. MITCHELL. It passed the House last session for $2,500, and passed the Senate with an amendment making the allowance $2,000. The same amount is reported now. There never has been any adverse report, I am sure.

Mr. HOWE. This is one of those claims, not very infrequent, where there is a strong suspicion that the claimant has been part a little and on that suspicion he makes an enormous demand; and to get rid of the very large demand, the committee and the two Houses are usually willing to pay something. My own idea is that a person who makes a demand of $18,000, and shows no pretense for more than $2,000, ought not to have anything.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CENTRAL BRANCH UNION PACIFIC ROAD.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (8. No. 60) declaring the true intent and meaning of the Union Pacific Railroad acts approved July 1, 1862, July 2, 1864, and July 3, 1866, and for other purposes.

Mr. INGALLS. That has gone over.

Mr. WRIGHT. Does the Senator from Kansas object to the present consideration of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill went over before by agreement, as the Chair understood.

PRESIDIO RESERVATION AT SAN FRANCISCO.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 130) to relinquish the interest of the United States in certain lands to the city and county of San Francisco, in the State of California.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that had better go over.

Mr. SARGENT. Before the Senator objects, I wish he would allow me to make a statement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. SARGENT. There is a report on this matter from the Military Committee, and there was one last year, and the bill has once passed the Senate. I mention this to show that it is not suddenly sprung. It failed in the House at the last Congress, after having passed the Senate, for want of time. It is a bill that I explained at the time of its original passage. The United States has a reservation called the Presidio reservation, containing thirteen or fourteen hundred acres of land. Twenty years ago the United States surveyed the eastern boundary of the reservation and put up its fence showing just the boundary which it claimed. The citizens of the city built up to that boundary which it claimed. The citizens of the city built up to that line, supposing that that survey concluded the Government and themselves. There was no question about it then. It was perfectly honest and fair on both sides. The Government surveyed the line for itself, and that was acquiesced in by the citizens. Subsequently the Government, in resurveying the reservation, made another survey of the line, and discovered that the true meridian threw one of the ends of its little farther to the east making a species of triangle commons. the line, and discovered that the true meridian threw one of the ends of it a little farther to the east, making a species of triangle commencing at nothing and continuing along to the other line. This variation of the meridian included a few acres. This shave threw into the reservation peoples' houses and garden-plots, and of a manufactory which was there it took off rather an inconvenient piece, though not a very large one. I should rather say that if the line had been changed it would have shaved through them; but since that time it has remained in abeyance. The citizens of San Francisco ask Congress to relinquish that little triangular piece for the benefit of the persons who occupy it; and the War Department entirely consents, and the Senate has once passed the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How many acres are there?

Mr. SARGENT. I do not know the exact number of acres; the committee report very few; I suppose not over half a dozen at the a bit which reindustret to the city of San Francisco the land on this eastern border of that reservation.

Mr. SARGENT. We did pass the bill in the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I mean the law.

Mr. SARGENT. There is an error in that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I speak of a law to settle that eastern boundary.

I think we passed it once, and afterward the citizens encroached still further, and this is to take off the next slice.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. Friend is in cover in covered to that This bill

Mr. SARGENT. My friend is in error in regard to that. This bill the Senate once passed, but there is no law to that effect; if there was, this bill would not be necessary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it go over for the present.

Mr. LOGAN. I can explain the matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to hearing an explanation.

Mr. LOGAN. The first survey of the Government ran the reservation over on to a certain line. A corrected survey leaves this little gore, which is about from a thousand to twelve hundred feet at one end and about one hundred feet at the other. I do not know how many acres it contains, but it must be very few. The city of San Francisco, as I understand, laid out this ground as a part of the ground belonging to the city. Since the survey has been corrected it leaves this gore belonging to the Government reservation; and the parties holding lands, lots, houses, and buildings on the gore ask that the Government relinquish its title so that the title may be perfect in the parties who bought from the city of San Francisco. That is the whole case.

Mr. SARGENT. There is an additional fact, that it is convenient for the Government as well as for the people to have one street particularly run there.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But this bill provides for about a dozen streets

Mr. EDMUNDS. But this offi provides for about a dozen streets which I assume must run through this reservation.

Mr. SARGENT. That is very easily explained if the Senator will notice the paper before me. This gore piece comes in this way (indicating) and the streets abut against it; and the purpose is that the street shall be continued to the true line instead of having them go into any particular ownership. If a street does not run more than ten inches through the gore, we do not want those ten inches of street excluded. street excluded.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The streets, then, under this bill are not carried into what is now left as the reservation?

Mr. SARGENT. The streets are carried to the true line. If we confirm anything, we want to confirm the streets as well as the pri-

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I understand; but my question is, does this bill allow the streets of the city to be carried across what my friend calls the true line and into or across the reservations

Mr. SARGENT. Not at all.
Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; I will look at it, and perhaps withdraw my objection after a while.

Mr. SARGENT. Let the bill be passed over temporarily.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

MEDICAL CORPS OF THE ARMY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 320) to reduce the number and increase the efficiency of the Medical Corps; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill reduces the number of assistant surgeons now allowed by law to one hundred and twenty-five; abolishes the office of medical store-keeper; and prov ides, in addition to the grades now allowed by law, for four surgeons with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels; eight surgeons with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant-colonels, to be promoted by seniority from the medical officers of the Army.

The Committee on Military Affairs proposed to amend the bill by adding thereto-

That this act shall not be construed to deprive any medical officer or store-keeper now in office of his commission in the United States Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended so as to read: "A bill to reduce the number and increase the efficiency of the Medical Corps of the United States Army."

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 57) authorizing the payment of duties in legal-tenders and national-bank notes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let the bill go over. Mr. BOGY. I have already given notice that I wish to be heard on that bill on Monday.

PATTERSON M'NUTT.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S, No. 188) granting a pension to Patterson McNutt.

Mr. HAMILTON. I do not see the chairman of the Committee on Pensions in his seat. This was reported adversely; let the bill go over. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

PHILIP S. WALES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 123) for the relief of Philip S. Wales, medical inspector in the United States Navy; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Navy to place on the prize-list of the United States steamship Pensacola the name of Philip S. Wales, with the rank of surgeon in the Navy, as being entitled to receive his share of the proceeds of the prize-money awarded to the fleet under command of Admiral Farragut, to which fleet Surgeon Wales was attached during the operations resulting in the capture of New Orleans in the month of May, 1862.

PENSIONERS OF WAR OF 1812.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 89) to amend the act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and the widows of deceased soldiers," approved February 14, 1871, and to restore to the pension-rolls those persons whose names were stricken therefrom in consequence of disloyalty. Mr. ANTHONY. Let that go over, unless indeed by general consent it can be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions. It is evidently a matter that will lead to great discussion, and will come before us in another form. I should have no objection to its being recom-mitted.

Mr. WITHERS. I have no objection myself to this bill being recommitted, inasmuch as the probabilities are that a bill will come from the House of Representatives very speedily covering practically the same ground. On a consultation with the friends of the bill regard the course which is proposed as the most judicious course, to let one discussion cover the whole ground.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move, then, that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

LUTHER HALL.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 398) for the relief of Luther Hall.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to the bill; it is an extension of a patent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

PENSIONS OF NAVAL ENGINEERS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 35) equalizing pensions of certain officers; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Pensions proposed to amend the bill so as to make it read:

That from and after the passage of this act the pension for total disability of first assistant engineers, second assistant engineers, and third assistant engineers in the naval service, respectively, shall be the same as the pensions allowed to officers of the line or staff in the naval service with whom they have relative rank; and that all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith be, and are hereby, repealed.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask if there is not a mistake in the bill. I do not think there are any third assistant engineers in the Navy.

Mr. HAMILTON. The committee followed the Revised Statutes. Mr. HAMILION. The committee followed the Revised Statutes. Since the statutes have been revised the designation has been changed. In place of "first assistant engineers" in line 12, I move to insert "passed assistant engineers," and in the next line, instead of "second assistant engineers," to say simply "assistant engineers," and then "cadet engineers" in place of "third assistant engineers,"

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendments of the Senator from Texas to the amendment of the committee.

The amendments to the amendment were agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to inquire whether this bill enlarges

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to inquire whether this bill enlarges the class of persons who are now entitled to receive pensions?

Mr. HAMILTON. Not at all.

Mr. SARGENT. And it does not increase pensions?

Mr. HAMILTON. Not at all. In the pension law the assistant engineers were placed below their relative rank, and this bill brings them up and simply gives them pensions according to the relative rank they have in the Navy, which is proper. It is conceded by the whole committee to be a proper thing to do, and they reported the bill unanimously. By examining the pension law you will see that second and third assistant engineers, as they stood on the old law, are put down in the class below the officers with whom they rank. Now this brings them up to their proper rank on the pension-roll. them up to their proper rank on the pension-roll.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended to read; A bill equalizing pensions of certain officers in the Navy.

GENERAL ROUSSEAU'S WIDOW.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 326) for the relief of the widow of L. H. Rousseau, deceased, late brigadier-general and brevet major-general of the United States Army; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill increases the pension heretofore granted to the widow of Lovell H. Rousseau, deceased, late a brigadier-general and brevet ma-jor-general in the Army of the United States, from the sum of $30 to the sum of $50 per month.

The Committee on Pensions proposed to amend the bill by adding

This act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to inquire of the committee if there are not one or more bills of theirs on file reducing pensions to $30 ? have a somewhat distinct impression that I took up a bill reported from the committee recently, a bill originally introduced for $50, and found an amendment reported by the committee making it $30.

Mr. WITHERS. That was for a different rank in the service. That was $50 for a pension to the widow of a major, and we reduced that to $30 in consequence of the difference of rank.

Mr. SARGENT. That was the cause of my question.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amend-ment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WRITS OF MANDAMUS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 13) to amend the fourteenth section of the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I object to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

JOSEPH BUTT'S HEIRS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 425) granting a The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 425) granting a pension to James Eli Butts and Malinda Frances Butts; which was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension-laws, the names of James Eli Butts and Malinda Frances Butts, minor heirs of Joseph Butts, late a private in Company G, Seventh Regiment Maryland Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIZZIE DICKSON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 246) for the relief of Miss Lizzie Dickson.

Mr. KELLY. That has been reported adversely, I perceive.
Mr. WRIGHT. Is there objection to considering this now?
Mr. KELLY. I think we had better not consider any bills reported adversely

Mr. WRIGHT. I only proposed to let the adverse report be concurred in.

Mr. KELLY. Very well. If it can be got off the Calendar by an indefinite postponement, I am satisfied.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question on the adverse report.

The bill was indefinitely postponed.

ANACOSTIA AND POTOMAC RIVER RAILROAD.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 295) to amend the act entitled "An act giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad, and to regulate its construction and operation;" which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The first amendment was in section 1, line 8, to strike out the words "twelve months from the passage of this act," and insert-

Six months from and after the completion of the streets now in process of improvement along and upon which the chartered rights of the company extend.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment is in section 2, lines 10 and 11, to strike out
"Eighth street west, along and upon Eighth street west, to F street north," and insert-

The south side of Pennsylvania avenue at a point opposite Center Market: Provided. That whenever the street pavement may be torn up and travel thereon interfered with by removal of the track of said road, said company shall, at its own expense, put such street pavement in as good order as before the laying of the track thereon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WASHINGTON INEBRIATE ASYLUM.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 359) to incorporate the Washington City Inebriate Asylum in the District of Columbia; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The first amendment was to strike out section 11 in the following

Sec. 11. That no person shall sell any strong or spirituous liquors or wine or fermented liquors within the distance of one-fourth of a mile from the outward bounds of the land and premises of the said asylum hereby incorporated, and whoever shall violate the terms of this section shall forfeit $50 for each offense, and shall also be guilty of a misdemeanor.

Mr. WRIGHT. I should like to know from the Senator having the bill in charge what is the reason for striking out this section. Is there any necessity growing out of the probable location of the asylum for striking it out; or is it because they think it is proper that these sales should be allowed within the distance named?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I will say in reply to my honorable friend, though I did not hear exactly what he said, that if the commissioners here named choose to buy fifty acres of land adjoining the city, any person having the right to sell liquor within a quarter of a mile of that location would be deprived of that right. Congress will have control of the matter hereafter; and therefore the committee thought proper to strike out the section.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have been quite as unfortunate as the Senator was with me, in not being able to hear what he said. The inquiry I made was whether the ground upon which the committee struck out this section was that the probable location of the institution would be such that it would be impossible to enforce this regulation, or whether it was because they do not believe that in principle it is or whether it was because they do not believe that in principle it is necessary to prohibit such sales.

Mr. ROBERTSON. It would be impossible to carry out the provision in the event of a certain location. We leave the location to the discretion of the commissioners.

Mr. CONKLING. If I may ask a question, in any event, no matter where the asylum may be located, what difficulty is there in enforcing this provision? This city of Washington, being a part of the District, is under the exclusive control of Congress. Cannot Congress say that liquors shall not be sold in a certain part of the city or within a quarter of a mile of the residence of this asylum whenever it comes to reside in any particular part of the city?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Congress can say that at any future time as

Mr. CONKLING. I agree to that; but I suggest to the Senator as a mode of answering an objection which he says has been made, that this section cannot stand on the power of a mere prohibition, that Congress would have power to say that liquor shall not be sold within twenty rods or forty rods or a quarter of a mile of the Treasury Department, for example, or of the jail of the District, or any other place within it. Whether it would be wise to say so, or not, is another thing; but in setting up an institution of this sort, if the Senator thinks as he says and as I should think from the little that I know about it, that it is desirable to prohibit the sale of intoxicating drinks in the immediate vicinity, I do not see why under the power to prohibit this section might not be enacted, and then the persons who are engaged in the sale of liquor of course must take their chances as to whether the location comes to be such as to bring them within it or not, and if it does they must either suspend the sale of liquor or they must move their business somewhere else.

Mr. ROBERTSON. This limitation of a quarter of a mile may prohibit a man from selling who now has authority of law to sell.

Mr. CONKLING. This would override that authority.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to strike out the section.

The question being put, there were on a division-ayes 13, noes

10; no quorum voting.

Mr. SARGENT. Is debate in order now, pending a division?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senate must be counted, or the yeas and nays called. I ask for a call of the yeas and nays as the easiest mode.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SARGENT. Is not debate in order pending the call of the yeas and nays?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not when there is no quorum present. Mr. NORWOOD. I should like to have the amendment reported

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The section will be read.

Mr. SARGENT. I object to its being read. That is in the nature

The section proposed to be stricken out was read.

Mr. SARGENT. I inquire if I am not in order now in speaking on the proposition upon which we are called to vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A division of the Senate having disclosed the lack of a quorum, the Senator from New York asked for a call of the roll to disclose whether there is a quorum present.

Mr. SARGENT. On that ground I admit the Chair is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll to ascertain whether a quorum is present.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Messrs, Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Boutwell, Bruce, Caperton, Christiancy, Cockrell, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Eaton, Edmunds, English, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, Key, Logan, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Paddock, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, West, Windom, Withers, and Wright.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are fifty-two Senators present. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Now that a quorum is present it may be that there will be no difficulty in assenting to the amendment of the committee. Being under that impression, I will not detain the Senate more than a moment or two. I understand that the reason of the committee in moving to strike out this section is the uncertainty as to the location of the institution. That certainly is a good reason. If the building were located at the junction of Pennsylvania avenue and Seventh street or Fourteenth street, it would be extremely difficult to enforce the law against any sale of spirituous liquors within a quarter of a mile of its land. Of course, if the institution is going out in the countries of the second street of the second street of the second try on a pasture of its own, it might be well enough to prevent waytry on a pasture of its own, it might be well enough to prevent wayside groggeries being set up to debauch and demoralize the inmates that it was endeavoring to reclaim. I think, however, that it is impossible in a crowded city to enforce what are called the principles of the Maine law or prohibitory liquor legislation. I believe that has been the experience in Maine itself, the experience wherever it has been tried. This passion of mankind, which is co-extensive with the species, which finds gratification in every country and among every race, is as strong in civilization as it is in barbarism. It makes no difference whether the stimulant is the betel-nut, or the hasheesh, or the whisky, repressive laws do not prevent its being used. Men will have this gratification. have this gratification.

Being fully satisfied that it will be impossible to execute a law like this in the city of Washington, I am opposed to having it put upon the statute-book. It would be a mere dead letter. While I believe in temperance and think the intemperate use of liquor is degrading in temperance and think the intemperate use of induor is degrading to mankind collectively and individually, debasing his manhood, destroying his reason, I am firmly convinced that the only method of reform is that which shall reach the individual, especially through moral sussion; that shall enlighten the understanding of the individual, and thereby make society better. Any repressive laws are dead letters on the statute-book, and perhaps worse. For that reason I am in favor of the amendment of the committee striking out this pro-

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, my objection to this section is that this provision is to operate on persons and property outside of the institution. If it were only to operate on the property of the institution itself, the lands in its possession, I should have no particular objection; but when it is to operate outside on persons and property, I think it should be contained in some other law than an act of incorporation

Mr. WRIGHT. I am utterly surprised at the objection urged by the Senator from Michigan. I understand that this is an act to in-corporate this asylum. We want in the law all the provisions that corporate this asylum. We want in the law all the provisions that are reasonable and just for the purpose of protecting it. Among other things, we propose that the persons who are here collected shall be as free as possible from the dangers and temptations which have led them to the life they have pursued and have led them to this place. The Senator says he is opposed to it because it operates on outside property. Do we not know that it is a matter of every-day occurrence in State legislation as it is here? We incorporate, for instance, a State agricultural society, provide for county agricultural societies, and in all and each of such acts we provide that liquor shall not be sold nearer than a quarter of a mile, or half a mile, or some distance that is named in the bill. It is legitimate, it is proper, it is germane; it is necessary for the protection of the institution or of the

Now, Mr. President, so far as the question of the policy of prohibi-tion is concerned, I humbly submit we have not anything to do with that here. Whether we can or cannot enforce prohibition as a rule or principle, I submit we have nothing to do with.

Mr. SARGENT. Allow me to ask a question.
Mr. WRIGHT. Certainly.
Mr. SARGENT. I should like to inquire whether the agricultural parks or race-tracks to which the Senator refers are situated in the heart of cities?

Mr. WRIGHT. That is a question that goes to the matter of policy and not of power.

Mr. SARGENT. I did not assume that Congress had not the power to pass this statute. I believe it has the power. It has the power to do a great many things. It has the power to order this Capitol to be set on fire, but that is no reason why it should exercise it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I should doubt very much whether it had that power.

Mr. SARGENT. I use it only as an illustration. I think it has.
Mr. WRIGHT. I say with the general question of the policy of prohibition we have nothing to do in this case. It is a question whether, as applied to this institution and its interests, it is or is not say that if there be persons already engaged in the sale, and if you propose to locate your institution within a quarter of a mile of such places, if it be found to the interests of the institution to so locate it, then it is entirely competent and in the power of Congress to say that they shall stop, because we have entire legislative control over the subject. I think that the sale should be prohibited if the institution shall be located so near a tavern, or the places where those saloons are shall be located so near a tavern, or the places where those saloons are now kept. If such shall be the policy, there ought to be the power to prohibit the sale at once; and if there be any such places, the subsequent sale should be prohibited. I think it will be found, where these institutions have been located in the States, that similar provisions are in all the acts creating them. I think the same thing ought to be done in the District of Columbia that we do wisely and justly in the States. It is done in some places as to colleges, as the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Frelinghuysen,] suggests to me. It is done in all the States as to religious assemblies or convocations; and why not do it with reference to this institution? Why shall we permit to be recognized a different rule to obtain in the District of permit to be recognized a different rule to obtain in the District of Columbia from what obtains in all the States?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not understand that the location of this institution is fixed in the act; therefore it is perfectly competent for the trustees of the institution to locate it where it will not be subject to the difficulties that the Senator from California refers to in enforcing the law. An institution of this kind certainly would not be located within a quarter of a mile of Pennsylvania avenue or of any places where liquors are openly sold; but it will be put undoubtedly in some remote place; and it seems to me that it is not only within our competence, as I think no one denies, but it is perfectly proper, that we should protect it from such a danger.

Mr. SARGENT. I would inquire what reason there is for locating it in some remote place where it would be a quarter of a mile free it in some remote place where it would be a quarter of a mile from other occupied property? The county jail is on Judiciary Square; Providence Hospital is almost on Pennsylvania avenue. This is a kind of hospital-partially a prison, and partially a hospital. Why send it out of town when these others are right around us?

Mr. ANTHONY. When I say "in a remote place," I do not mean that it shall be remote from population, but I mean remote from those places where liquor is sold in such a way that the law cannot reach it. It ought to be located in such a place.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not know what the Senafor means by liquor being sold in such a way that the law cannot reach it.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from California says it is impossible to suppress the sale of liquor in certain places.

Mr. SARGENT. I say it is impossible to prevent the sale of liquor by arbitrary measures; that there is a taste which mankind has for stimulants of this kind, arising it may be from defective education or from habit or association, which will be gratified. That is true not merely of this vice but of other vices, and repressive legislation does not reach it; and my idea is that the only way to do it is to reform the individual, reform society, commencing at the bottom instead of at the top.

Mr. ANTHONY. That would be an objection to legislation against a great many vices.

Mr. SARGENT. I think it is.

Mr. ANTHONY. But it seems to me that this institution ought not to be located in any place where the provision of law now under discussion could not be enforced. As the Senator from Iowa says, I think it has nothing to do with the general question of prohibition; and certainly the sale of liquor ought to be prohibited within a reasonable distance of an institution that is intended to reform inebriates. It seems to me that it is very germane to the bill.

Mr. ROBERTSON. If there was any indication of where the location would be, we might have a chance to determine the propriety of riserting this section now; but the commissioners may locate it on Pennsylvania avenue near the principal hotels of the city, and how could we prevent the sale of liquor within a quarter of a mile of such a location? There is no prohibition to their locating there. The committee though it better to strike out this section, which will still leave the matter within the control of the control of still leave the matter within the control of Congress.

Mr. INGALLS. This bill was considered with great care in the Committee on the District of Columbia, and the only limitation upon the location of the institution that is provided is contained, I believe, in the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth lines of the first section, which provided that the institution may "take, purchase, have, lease, and hold real estate not exceeding sixty acres in the District of Columbia;" and it is provided further in the same section "that the property held by the said asylum shall never exceed $500,000 in value." Every Senator will observe that, under the limitations imposed upon the Senator will observe that, under the limitations imposed upon the location, it is entirely practicable to build this institution and maintain it in the heart of the city of Washington. They may purchase property upon Pennsylvania avenue or upon any other of the business or residence streets of this city, and it appears to me in entire consonance with the purposes of the bill. The asylum is intended, as the Senator from California has said, partly as a reiormatory and partly as a prison for the reception of those persons who by the disease of alcoholism have become so incapable of restraint and of the management of their own personal affairs and their own property that it becomes necessary to remove them for a time from society and place them where the restrictions of law can be imposed upon them. In the eighth section it is declared:

That any justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, upon petition or complaint, duly verified, and presented by any relative of an inebriate or habitual drunkard, or by any officer of this asylum, or by any officer of police of said District of Columbia, shall proceed thereupon to appoint a commission to inquire into the case, in the same manner as is directed by law in relation to the care and custody of the persons and estates of idiots, lunatics, persons of unsound mind, and drunkards, and according to the rules and practice of the said supreme court in such cases.

And then, upon the conclusion of that inquiry, the "justice of the supreme court may issue an order committing such inebriate or habitual drunkard to the said asylum for a period not exceeding one year, as said justice may deem proper."

So it is not necessary that this institution for reformatory purposes should be located remote from the center of population. All the objects and purposes that are here contemplated can be carried out just as well and just as thoroughly effectuated in the city of Washington as they can within ten miles outside of its limits, because there is an actual restraint contemplated just as much as in the case of a criminal committed to prison for an infraction or violation of any of the penal statutes. The Senator, therefore, can see that the eleventh section is entirely superfluous in the first place. There is no necessity whatever for declaring "that no person shall sell any strong or spirituous liquors or wine or fermented liquors within the distance of one-fourth of a mile from the outward bounds of the land and premises of the said asylum hereby incorporated," any more than there would be for declaring that no liquor should be sold within a quarter of a mile of the limits of the District jail, and the committee believed it would be entirely inoperative, and besides that it would be an improper and unjustifiable interference with the rights of the citizens of this city and District. For these reasons they unanimously recommended that the section should be stricken out, and I trust that the Senate will see the wisdom of that recommendation and assent establishment of this institution a quarter of a mile from any place where liquor is sold, I should see no particular objection to it coupled with a prohibition of the sale of liquor after the establishment of the institution. But as long as it is competent to establish it anywhere within the city limits, it seems to me to be rather an unjustifiable interference with persons and property already established around it. If any one will move an amendment that the institution shall be established at such a distance from any place where liquor is sold, I will vote for the amendment.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, if this bill provided for the of all places correctly described as asylums.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia to strike out the sec-

Mr. WRIGHT. - I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. I wish to understand this amendment. The bill as it went to the committee contained a proviso that there should be no sale of ardent spirits within a measured quarter of a mile of the ex-terior walls of this proposed inebriate asylum. The committee have stricken that out, and I understand the question before the Senate to be whether we shall retain that restriction or whether we shall pass the bill without it.

I understand as a fact that the site of this proposed institution has not yet been fixed upon. It therefore may be placed within the built-up part of the town; it may be placed in juxtaposition with some of the large and essential hotels of the town whose business would be destroyed or materially interfered with if this proviso should become a law. Having the strongest sympathy with the objects of this institution, believing that it affords to-day the truest method of dealing with this unhappy vice and those who are the victims of it, I still do not consider it necessary that any such radius of exclusion should be drawn around the building. It would seem a reasonable and proper thing that such an institution should be located in the rural districts of the town or beyond the reach of the town at all, but the fact of measuring a quarter of a mile and allowing drinking-houses to exist at that distance will not save these unhappy victims of this vice from indulging their tastes. You would have to put a much greater dis-tance between these people and the object of their desire than this short step that a fourth of a mile would afford if you really meant to make it efficient. So the result will be that you may materially injure the value of large hotel properties; you may materially inter-fere with the convenience of a large portion of the traveling popula-tion and the resident population of the city, and after you have done it you have not reached the object for which this proviso was in-tended, which is the protection of the inmates of this asylum from the temptation afforded by the propinquity of places where liquor

I trust that so long as the situs of this institution is unsettled, no and settled, for congress then to protect them by a cordon of temperance all around the building if they think it necessary; but it would be palpably unjust to present property-holders and absolutely threaten the convenience of a very large portion of this community if such a line of demarkation was adopted by the Senate as proposed by this rection. It trust therefore that the community we will be entitled in the convenience. section. I trust therefore that the committee will be sustained in the amendment which they have reported, and that the restriction of this quarter of a mile circle will be stricken from the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the question before the Senate, as In resident, the question before the Schatc, as I understand it, has nothing to do with the general question of prohibiting the sale of alcoholic drinks. I think I measure my expression when I say it has nothing to do with it. The bill proposes to establish an asylum for the treatment of inebriates, so called. It is to become what has come to be very incorrectly called "an inebriate to become what has come to be very incorrectly called "an inebriate asylum;" and the question is whether it is wise or not to establish an asylum of that sort, and then allow liquor to be sold under its very eaves. As I understand it, that is the whole question. When you come to the modal part of it; to the formal inquiry whether the bill is now or would be with this provision retained as it should be to answer the purpose, I discard that as matter of detail from the observation that I make. If there be force in the suggestion made by the Senator from California, very likely the bill should be changed. His suggestion is that if this asylum should be leasted at the inner His suggestion is that if this asylum should be located at the junction of Seventh street and Pennsylvania avenue, or Fourteenth street and Pennsylvania avenue, the provision if retained would work great injury and inconvenience. Undoubtedly it would; but does any Senator suppose that an asylum authorized to acquire a piece of real estate not more than sixty-five acres in extent, (not that it need be sixty-five acres to be sure, but not more than sixty-five acres in extent,) is to be set up in the heart of a populous city? Does anybody suppose that it is going to occupy the site now occupied by the Treasury building, or Willard's Hotel, or any other site in the builtup part of the town as the Senator from Delaware expressed it? I imagine not. Every one must see that if the principles of common sense are to govern, some location is to be selected where, although sixty-five acres of ground may not be found unoccupied, that large expanse of ground will be found required, as everybody knows who knows anything about it, for an institution of this sort—required in order that there may be areas inclosed within the structure itself for exercise and opportunities such as must be afforded to the inmates Bearing that in mind, I repeat can any one suppose that a location is to be made which would make this provision now in question oper ate upon Willard's Hotel, and the Arlington and other established hotels in the heart of Washington? If there be force in such an apprehension, then I say change the bill and require as reason and necessity will require that this building shall be in the environs of cessity will require that this building shall be in the environs of Washington, indeed beyond them; require that it shall not come within the suburbs of the city. But it seems to me at the same time that we ought to require that the vending of spirituous liquor shall not be brought within the very reach of those whom it is the mission of this institution to put beyond that reach. It would be very odd to provide for erecting a powder-mill, and then leave a blast-furnace to grow up by the side of it; very odd to expend a large sum of money in fencing men against intemperance, guarding them against the temptation of swallowing liquor, and then present it to them, not as water was presented to him of old, to recede when it was about to touch his lips, but to be really within his reach.

So, Mr. President, as I voted upon this question before, I felt inclined to say that I did not regard it as a matter pertaining to the general issue of prohibiting the sale of intoxicating drink, or as branching out into the temperance question in any of its forms, but branching out into the temperance question in any of its forms, but simply a matter of putting this building and its inclosures where they ought to be, apart from the commerce and traffic in liquor. And as this provision bears upon that and its retention under any argument I have heard can necessitate nothing more than requiring by law, if you think the necessity is not strong enough, the location of the building where it will not work the inconvenience alluded to, I see no reason why it should not stand, and I shall vote against its being stricken out.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A distinguished Senator, in whose opinions I have Mr. EDMUNDS. A distinguished Senator, in whose opinions I have very great confidence, has suggested a substitute for this section which may strike those who oppose the section proposed to be stricken out with favor; and it is that the section should be made to read: "That this asylum shall not be located within a quarter of a mile of any place where liquor is sold," so as to give the rum-seller the first choice of location, and to compel the asylum to go outside of that. If it were not for the modesty of the distinguished Senator who made the suggestion, I should, if not call him by name, call him by his State; but it certainly illustrates what the Senator from New York has been saying. This, so far as this section is concerned, seems to be a collision between the interest of those who sell liquors and the interest of those humane people who endeavor by the form of co-operterest of those humane people who endeavor by the form of co-operative work to relieve the terrible evils of intemperance. Certainly Certainly these institutions are among the most beneficent that society provides for the unfortunate. Everybody must agree to that; and yet when in a bill it is proposed, as it is necessary it should be somewhere and at some time, that there shall not be brought up under its eaves a grog-shop to tempt those who may go out to walk from this asylum, then there is an objection that it will depreciate the real estate because the value of real estate depends in some degree upon its capacity to sell liquors to people. If we are to stop a great public benefit on the ground that the location of this asylum may somewhere come within a quarter of a mile of a grog-shop, we might as well give up the bill altogether. It appears to me that there is no foundation for such a point. It is essential to the proper working of these institutions that they should be separated by a considerable space from temptation, and in order to do it you must provide a prohibition by law and a penalty for its violation. The bill undertakes to do that, and we are met with the practical argument, "This will depreciate real estate." Suppose it does, what vested right has anybody who owns real estate to so use it as to interfere with the public good? If these institutions are proper, as we all agree that they are, no citizen has a right to set up in the neighborhood of them what is a nuisance to public interests.

So it appears to me there is no ground for striking out this section at all. If the people who choose to engage in this class of business of selling liquor find that they cannot sell liquor within that space, then let them devote their property to some better use, or let them move to some other place to sell their liquor. All the States almost who have institutions of this kind and other institutions make provisions against certain dangerous things being brought within a certain space where the public good and the public safety require that they shall not go. This falls within that principle. Why should we not apply it, then? Certainly, Mr. President, the more you think of it the more the case is truly stated in the way my friend—whose name I am not at liberty to mention—suggested as the bitterest kind of satire upon the opposition to this section. Correctly stated, it should be a proposition, if you would strike out this section, that this beneficent institution should not be located anywhere where it would interfere with rum-selling. I think it ought to be located somewhere where it will interfere with rum-selling, and the more the better. That is the way it seems to me.

There are some other things in the bill, as I am now up, that I think ought to be corrected. There is one that has struck my notice: that as to what constitutes membership and the right to vote in the society upon the payment of $10, without any limitation of time within which this $10 is to be paid. The result will be that the number of corporators will continually increase by the subscriptions of persons either for good or for bad purposes, and by and by it is possible that this corporation in this district may fall into the condition that the Washington Monument corporation did for one year or two when the law authorized anybody to be a corporator who should pay a dollar. The result was anybody to be a corporator who should pay a dollar. The result was that a great number of people within a year or two paid in their dollar and got control of the corporation and turned it upside down, as it is said, and diverted it entirely from the original purpose to which it was devoted. There is the danger in this bill of exactly the same thing happening. The bill ought to provide, if a subscriber of $10 is to be a member, that in order to be entitled to vote he must have read his $10 within the veer in which an election is to take place. paid his $10 within the year in which an election is to take place. I hope that a correction of that kind will be made before the bill is passed.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not regard intemperauce or alcoholism so much a vice or a crime as a disease; and at the proper time and on a suitable occasion I will go as far as anybody to protect society and restrain the individuals from its evil effects; but this bill has no connection whatever with that subject. It has the humane, beneficent, and philanthropic purpose of enabling certain gentlemen to associate themselves and purchase property and create an institution that shall protect society and guard individuals against the effects of this vice so far as they have been already incurred. I regret very much that the apostles of prohibition and the missionaries of the Maine law have seen proper on this occasion to obtrude their peculiar views as an obstacle to the accomplishment of this purpose that must commend itself to every generous nature. The object of those who insist that this amendment shall not be agreed to and that the section shall that this amendment shall not be agreed to and that the section shall remain as in the bill originally sent to the committee, is that temptation should be removed as far as possible from the inmates of this projected or proposed asylum. The Senator from New York said, "Would you erect a powder-mill and then permit a blast-furnace to be instituted near by its limits?" With all respect to him, and with all respect to the Senator from Vermont, who, after having spoken, has left the Chamber, I venture to suggest that it is entirely fallacious. The object of this bill is to provide a place of refuge, a place of restraint, and a person who is committed to this asylum when it is built will have no more right and no more power to go beyond its limits than a criminal committed to a common jail or a penitentiary. He will be under restraint, and if he goes beyond its limits he will become a fugitive, and will be liable to be re-arrested and recommitted. How absurd it would be in case a prison or a penand recommitted. How absurd it would be in case a prison or a penitentiary is established in this District or anywhere else, to say that it shall not be located within a quarter of a mile of any place where the possibility of a crime can exist, for which the persons were committed to that prison. Take the case of homicide. A man is sent to a penitentiary for murder. How ridiculous it would be to say that no human being upon whom the crime of homicide could be committed should be brought within less than a quarter of a mile of that institution. Suppose a thief or a robber is committed to a penitentiary, how nonsensical would be the idea that no object upon which larceny could be committed should be brought within less than a quarter of a mile of the place where the person is committed for that crime. The position is entirely untenable.

The theory of the bill is that these persons are under restraint, and the fact of a place where liquor can be sold being established within a quarter of a mile of the boundary of this institution is entirely immaterial. It is immaterial whether it is built under the walls of it or within a quarter of a mile or a mile of it, because the theory of the bill is that these persons are under restraint, and that therefore by that fact temptation is removed from them. It makes no differ-ence how near the opportunity may be brought by other persons, be-cause the object of the bill is to put persons who may be tempted by that where they cannot reach it, no matter where it be located. Therefore the arguments that are brought in favor of the retention of this section appear to me to be entirely without foundation.

But there is one other reason that seems to me to render the action

But there is one other reason that seems to me to render the action of the committee desirable and proper, and that is that the sale of intoxicating liquors in this District, as I understand, is the subject of license. It is now under restraint. No person has a right to sell liquor unless he has obtained in the first place permission to do so from the authorities, and if he has complied with the law he is rightfully selling this article as he would sell any other kind of merchandise; and to place a restriction of this kind in this bill is simply illogical, and will certainly be entirely ineffectual. It would be an attempt to interfere with rights that however these Senators may consider to interfere with rights that, however these Senators may consider them in a moral point of view, are guaranteed by the Constitution and by the laws the same as those in regard to any other description or kind of property.

I hope, therefore, that the action of the committee will be adhered to.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bogy, Booth, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Cragin, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Howe, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Merrimon, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Paddock, Randolph, Saulsbury, Sharon, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, West, and Whyte—29.
So the amendment was rejected.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move to amend the eleventh section by inserting the following proviso at the end of it:

Provided. That the site or location of said asylum be not nearer than one-quarter of a mile to the corporate limits of the city of Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia was in section 15, line 1, to strike out "the United States Congress or," and after the words "territorial Legislature," in line 2, to insert "municipal council, or authorities of the District of Columbia;" so as to read:

That any State or territorial Legislature, municipal council, or authorities of the District of Columbia, may provide for the maintenance in the said asylum of any number of poor patients by appropriating sufficient funds for that purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 16, in the following words:

Sec. 16. That the property, personal or real, of said asylum shall be exempt from all taxes and assessments levied under act of Congress or by authority of any municipal corporation or board within the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to the seventeenth section the following proviso:

And provided, That no money shall ever be appropriated by the United States to aid in the construction or support of said institution.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I would call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the committee recommended a change in the enumeration of the

that the committee recommended a change in the enumeration of the sections succeeding the eleventh, rendered necessary by their amendment to strike that section out, and it will now be necessary to restore the numbering of the sections as they were in the original bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be done by the Secretary.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask the attention of the Senator having the bill in charge to section 8 as printed. It is a mere clerical matter, but for greater certainty I suggest that in line 23 where it reads "such order of commitment may be vacated or modified by any justice of the supreme court on cause duly shown," to strike out "the" and insert "said," so as to read "said supreme court," inasmuch as it refers to the supreme court of the District of Columbia preceding, and "the" may leave it indefinite. may leave it indefinite.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and that amendment will be made.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RAILROAD IN WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 46) granting the right of way for a railroad and telegraph line to the Walla Walla and Columbia River Railroad Company across Fort Walla Walla military reservation, in Washington Territory, which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the right of way, not exceeding one hundred feet in width, through the lands of the Fort Walla Walla military reservation in Washington Territory is hereby granted to the Walla Walla and Columbia River Railroad Company, a corporation organized under the laws of said Territory, for the purpose of constructing a railroad and telegraph line: Provided, That the said right of way, and the width and location thereof through said lands, and the regulations for operating said railroad within the limits of the reservation so as to prevent all danger to public property shall be submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War prior to any entry on said lands or the commencement of the construction of said works: Provided also, That whenever said rights of way shall cease to be used for the purposes aforesaid the same shall revert to the United States.

Sec. 2. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEPOSITS IN BANKS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 324) to authorize deposits by clerks and other officers of courts in banks other than designated depositories.

Mr. WRIGHT. That was reported adversely from the Committee on Finance, and I ask that it may be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEXICO.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 229) to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. MITCHELL. I object to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill

Mr. SARGENT. I trust the Senator from Oregon will withdraw his objection in order that this bill may be considered.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state that I have no objection to the bill; I am in favor of it. The only reason I objected to it was because I supposed it would lead to discussion and could not be passed to-day. If posed it would lead to discussion and could not be passed to-day. If it can be taken up and passed now I should like to have it done.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is the same bill which was passed at the last session, and I presume it will elicit no discussion.

Mr. MITCHELL. All right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection being withdrawn, the bill will be read at length by the Secretary.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill, and was interrupted by—

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This bill evidently will give rise to delate. Is the Senate proceeding with it nuder the rule of considering. Is the Senate proceeding with it under the rule of considering unobjected cases unobjected cases?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator from Maine that it went over under objection. The Senator from Oregon withdrew his objection, and it is now being read at length.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is it open to objection?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection has been withdrawn.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That does not change the rule, I submit. If one party withdraws his objection, another party may object. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate, I take it, to consider a bill now. I submit that it takes the unanimous consent of the Senate to set aside the rule under which we are proceeding. I supposed the bill was being read for information; so I listened until I saw what it was.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is advised that that has been the practice under the Anthony rule, and he will be governed by it. Does the Senator from Maine object?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the bill will be passed over.
Mr. DAVIS. I understand the bill was objected to, but the objection was afterward withdrawn and the bill taken up. That was the time to object, and not after the reading was commenced while the bill was being considered. I do not know that I am right, but that was my understanding. I should like to have the Chair state the case exactly

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will answer the Sena-or. The Anthony rule is not before the Chair, but the Chair under-

tor. The Anthony rule is not before the Chair, but the Chair understands the practice has been under it to entertain an objection at any time. If so, the objection of the Senator from Maine is in order.

Mr. DAVIS. At any time during the consideration of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. While the bill is being read for information. The bill had not been read, but was being read, and the Senator from Maine rose and objected to its further consideration.

Mr. DAVIS. If that be so I appeal to my friend from Maine to allow the bill to come up and be read. We had as well consider it now as at any other time if it is to be considered at all. If a majority of the Senate are in favor of proceeding with the bill, I hope the question will be submitted to them, and that it will not be postponed upon an objection made by a single Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine withdraw his objection?

draw his objection?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine persists in

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is a motion in order to proceed to the consideration of this bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 229.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It seems to me that this is too important a bill to be taken up at so late an hour as this in the day. Of course if it had been understood that this bill was to come up there would have been a fuller attendance of Senators on the present occasion. It is one which will involve a considerable amount of discussion whenever it does come up, and it seems to me that it would be better to bring it up and make it the order of the day for some future occasion than to take it up near the close of the session of to-day when Senators who are absent were not aware of any purpose to bring it up.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If there was anything novel in the matter of Mr. HITCHCOCK. If there was anything novel in the matter of this bill, I certainly would not press it on the consideration of the Senate, but the same bill was fully debated by the Senate last session and adopted by a large vote. I think the bill now before the Senate is an exact copy of the bill which the Senate then passed. While of course I would not insist on its consideration if it were to lead to debate, I thought it would elicit no discussion, and I still think it will elicit very little. I should like a vote on my motion.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have no objection to having it considered at the proper time, but I hardly think it would be fair to bring it up to-day when the Senate was not advised it was to be taken up and decided to-day.

Mr. CONKLING. I trust the Senator from Nebraska will neither

Mr. CONKLING. I trust the Senator from Nebraska will neither Mr. CONKLING. I trust the Senator from Nebraska will neither press his motion nor ask us to vote upon it. Those who are unwilling to give a vote apparently unfriendly to the bill would be put in a very awkward attitude if brought to a vote upon his motion now. The Senator from Vermont has omitted to call attention to the fact that this day, being in the language of the Senator who proposed the arrangement, a lost day, when the business before us suddenly disappeared, was by agreement devoted to a call of the Calendar for unobjected cases. Senators relying upon that—I do not say how properly-have absented themselves from the Chamber, until once, upon a bill of some importance, the Senate found itself without a quorum, and it was only by a call of the Senate that fifty-odd Senators were brought here. That being the condition of the day and of the Senate, and that being the understanding by unanimous consent as to the devotion of this day, for a Senator, when a bill is objected to and does go over under the rule, to insist that the remainder of the Senate, those who are here witnesses to that arrangement, shall be compelled, because they may be friendly to a bill, to press it forward and to press it to a vote, little more than a quorum being present, I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska, as we should say in court, is not good practice. Therefore if he is friendly to the bill, as I know he is, I hope he will not press any Senator who may also be friendly to it, to vote either to take it up or to vote apparently against it, for the sake of observing an obligation, an arrangement, which I think fairly concludes any attempt to get up a contested matter to-day and press it to a vote.

After we have gone through with the Calendar, if time remains, perhaps it might be considered within the understanding then to advance contested business; but until this order, if I may so call it, (rea bill of some importance, the Senate found itself without a quorum, perhaps it might be considered within the understanding then to advance contested business; but until this order, if I may so call it, (resulting from the unanimous consent of the Senate, obtained when unexpectedly a request was made that the unfinished business coming up at the end of the morning hour should go over,) is executed, I should not feel at liberty to vote to take up any bill which it is known is not only one of importance but one of controversy, which Senators have left the Chamber with a fair right to suppose would not be considered. left the Chamber with a fair right to suppose would not be considered to-day

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have certainly no desire to press this bill upon the consideration of the Senate when any considerable number of Senators are absent. I desire particularly and especially that a vote shall be reached upon it in a full Senate. I shall be well satisfied that every Senator shall record his vote upon this bill; but it is a matter of such importance that I am anxious of course to obtain the early attention of the Senate to it. With the consent of the Senate I will withdraw my motion to take up the bill at the present time and move to make it the special order for Wednesday next at one

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Excepting any appropriation bills from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will make that exception.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To make this bill the special order of next Wednesday at one o'clock, not interfering with appropriation bills. Is there objection?

of next wednesday at one o'clock, not interfering with appropriation bills. Is there objection?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to state that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] may or may not desire to occupy the Senate at that time, and this special order would take the place I suppose of the business he has in charge. I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska whether he had better not except that also?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not desire to interfere with that case. I also except the order in which the Senator from Indiana is interested, the Pinchback case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will understand that any unfinished business will override a special order of this kind. Senators agreeing to make this the special order for Wednesday next at one o'clock will say "ay." [Putting the question.] Two-thirds having voted for the motion, the fact being that the vote is unanimous, the bill is made the special order for next Wednesday at one

ALSTORPHEUS WERNINGER.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 443) for the relief The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 443) for the relief of Alstorpheus Werninger; which was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of War to pay to Alstorpheus Werninger, late of the Sixth West Virginia Cavalry, out of any money appropriated or hereafter to be appropriated for the payment of the Army, a sum equal to the pay and emoluments of a second lieutenant of cavalry from the 3d of February 1865, to the 35th of Moreh 1865, because whether already received by ary, 1865, to the 25th of March, 1865, less amount already received by hin as sergeant-major.

Mr. INGALLS. Let us hear the report in that case read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. CLAYTON from the Committee on Military Affairs February 15:

Ton from the Committee on Military Affairs February 15:

The papers in the case show that the petitioner enlisted as a private in Company B, Third Regiment West Virginia Infantry, on June 10, 1861, and that this regiment was afterward mounted and known as the Sixth Regiment West Virginia Cavalry, and that petitioner was appointed sergeant-major of said regiment in 1863. That upon July 4, 1854, while carrying dispatches to General Kelly, at Cumberland, Maryland, notifying him of the approach of General Early, he was captured and remained a prisoner until December 11, 1864, when he was paroled, and that he was released from parole on March 25, 1865, when he immediately returned to his regiment and was recognized as a second lieutenant. That upon February 3, 1865, he was commissioned a second lieutenant by Governor Boreman, to take effect upon February 1, 1865, and that he was ready and willing to be sworn in as such officer, but was prevented by his parole from so doing.

Petitioner asks for the pay of a second lieutenant from February 3 to March 25, 1865, less the amount received by him as sergeant-major, and your committee are of the opinion that the claim should be allowed, and therefore report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOUTHERN CLAIMANTS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 69) to repeal so much of section 3480 of the Revised Statutes as forbids the payment of the accounts, claims, and demands therein named, and all laws and clauses of laws forbidding the payment thereof, and appropriating money to pay the same when duly established.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill is reported adversely, and it will go over.

EDUCATIONAL FUND.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 334) to establish an educational fund and apply a portion of the proceeds of the public lands to public education, and to provide for the more complete en-dowment and support of national colleges for the advancement of

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to state in relation to this bill that while I am ready myself to go on with it to-day there are other Senators who desire to make remarks upon it, and I therefore ask to have it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will state that I shall endeavor to call it up at a very early day.

SURGEON THOMAS F. AZPELL.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 408) for the relief of Assistant Surgeon Thomas F. Azpell, United States Army; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It sanctions the payments made by the Department of the Interior to Assistant Surgeon Thomas F. Azpell, United States Army, for medical services rendered the Hoopa Valley Indians at the request of said Department in the absence of other medical aid, and authorizes Assistant Surgeon Azpell absence of other medical and, and authorizes Assistant Surgeon Azpell to retain the compensation already paid, anything in the statutes of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is there a report in the case?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, and is accompanied, the Clerk informs the Chair, by no written report.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRUSSES FOR DISABLED SOLDIERS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 394) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for furnishing trusses to disabled soldiers," approved May 28, 1872; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It amends section 1 of the act approved May 28, 1872, so as to read:

That every soldier of the Union Army or naval service who was ruptured while in the line of duty during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion shall be entitled to receive a single or a double truss, of such style as may be designated by the Surgeon-General of the United States Army as best suited for such disability; and whenever the said trussor trusses so furnished shall become useless from wear, destruction, or loss, such soldier shall be supplied with another truss, on making a like application, as provided for in section 2 of the original act of which this is an amendment: Provided, That such application is not made more than once in two years.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GENERAL BENJAMIN H. GRIERSON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 366) to fix the date of entry into the military service of Colonel and Brevet Major-General Benjamin H. Grierson, United States Army, and to correct his record on the Army Register; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The bill ought to be explained, it seems to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is accompanied by a report.

Does the Senator desire to have the report read?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I would like to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be reported by the Clerk.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. Logan, from the Committee on Military Affairs, February 21:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (8. No. 366) to fix the date of entry into the military service of Colonel and Brevet Major-General Benjamin H. Grierson, United States Army, and to correct his record on the Army Register, have had the said bill under consideration, and report the same without amendment, and submit to the Senate the following evidence:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 18, 1874.

Washington, D. C., December 18, 1874.

I hereby certify that I commanded the Eighth Regiment of Illinois Volunteers from April 23 to July 25, 1861; that the regiment was stationed at Cairo, Illinois, under command of Brigadier-General B. M. Prentiss, who makes a certificate in this case; that General B. H. Grierson was on duty constantly on the staff of General Prentiss during all the time from May 8 to July 25, 1861, and that I often received orders from General Prentiss through General (then lieutenant) Grierson, as we supposed; that General Grierson remained with General Prentiss on duty a long time after 'the 25th of July, 1861, and that he was a faithful, useful, and almost indispensable soldier, and in my opinion he ought to receive, on the records and registry of the Army, credit for all of said service.

R. J. OGLESBY.

Senator JOHN A. LOGAN, Chairman Committee on Military Affairs.

QUINCY, ILLINOIS, December 15, 1874.

I hereby certify, upon honor, that Colonel and Brevet Major-General Benjamin H. Grierson, United States Army, served during the first year of the late war as lieutenant and aid-de-camp on my staff; that I appointed him to that position May 8, 1861, when I was in command of the United States forces at Cairo, Illinois; that he continued to serve in said capacity the same as if he had been regularly commissioned and mustered during the entire time that I commanded the United States forces at that point, and subsequently in Southeastern, Northern, and Central Missouri; that he did take part in expeditions, and rendered valuable and faithful service to the Government; that frequently important orders were transmitted through him and obeyed without question, and that he was recognized by all officers and soldiers under my command and by all military and civil officials with whom he came in contact as my aid-de-camp; that he continued to serve in that position until, upon my recommendation, he was appointed major of the Sixth Illinois Cavalry, October 24, 1861, to rank from August 28, 1861; that he was detached from his regiment by order of his colonel and commanding officer, and didremain on duty at my headquarters as a staff officer until the latter part of November, 1861, when, in pursuance of instructions from Major-General Halleck, United States Army, I ordered him to join his regiment; that he obeyed said order, and reported for duty about the lst of December, 1861, and remained on duty with his regiment until appointed a brigadier-general of volunteers in June, 1863.

B. M. PRENTISS,

United States Pension Agent,

Late Major-General United States Volunteers.

QUINCY, ILLINOIS, December 15, 1874.

I certify, on honor, that the statements made in the certificate of General B. M. Prentiss, in regard to the appointment and services of General Grierson, are correct. I was stationed at Cairo during the summer and fall of 1861, and am personally cognizant of these facts.

JOHN TILLSON United States Collector Internal Revenue, Fourth District, Illinois, Late Captain and Brevet Lieutenant Colonel Nineteenth Regiment Infantry, Late Colonel Tenth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and Brevet Brigadier-General Volunteers.

QUINCY, December 15, 1874.

Having read the annexed statements of General B. M. Prentiss, I hereby certify that they are true in all their particulars, having served at Cairo during the time mentioned.

JAMES D. MORGAN, Late Brevet Major-General United States Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed. ADDITIONAL BOUNTY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 73) to extend the time for filing claims for additional bounty under the act of July 28, 1866; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It extends the time limited for the purpose named until the 30th of January, 1877, and provides that all claims for such bounties filed in the proper Department after the 30th day of January, 1875, and before proper Department after the 30th day of January, 1875, and before the passage of the act, shall be deemed to have been filed in due time, and shall be considered and decided without refiling.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. WITHERS. Is there any report accompanying the bill stating the necessity for the extension?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill was reported by the Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state the object of the bill. Many persons who are entitled to bounty under the law after the war was over scattered.

are entitled to bounty under the law, after the war was over scattered in different directions. Many of them went to the mines, and are off at great distances, and did not make their applications in time. This bill merely extends the time one year longer in order to give them an opportunity to apply for the bounty they are entitled to.

Mr. WITHERS. Is the Senator possessed of information that there are any of that class of claimants whose claims have been excluded by that limitation?

Mr. LOGAN. All claimants who were excluded by the limitation, of course are included in this bill.

Mr. WITHERS. I know that; but does the Senator know of any

Mr. LOGAN. I know of no case myself, but I have had quite a number of letters written to me in reference to the subject. This bill merely gives an opportunity to those who did not apply in time or whose papers are on file, to have them acted on. That is all. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALVIS SMITH.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 3) for the relief of Alvis Smith; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Alvis Smith, late of Company L, Second Arkansas Cavalry, out of any money appropriated or which may hereafter be appropriated for the pay of the Army, a sum equal to the pay and emoluments of a second lieutenant of cavalry, from the 10th of October, 1863, to the 8th of March, 1864, deducting whatever pay he may have received for that period as an enlisted man.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY JACKSON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No.27) for the relief of First Lieutenant Henry Jackson, Seventh Cavalry, United States Army; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department to credit First Lieutenant Henry Jackson, Seventh Cavalry, United States Army, property and disbursing officer in the Signal Service, in his account with the United States with the sum of $1,271.34, being the appearance? being the amount paid by him to Matt France and George M. Brown, citizens of Colorado Springs, Colorado Territory, on false vouchers, and to David H. Sackett, sergeant in the Signal Service, United States Army, on false receipts presented by him.

Mr. WITHERS. Is their any report accompanying that bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretaryread the following report, submitted by Mr. Spencer, from the Committee on Military Affairs, on the 19th of January, 1875;

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3860) for the relief of Lieutenant Henry Jackson, Seventh United States Cavalry, submit the following report:

This is a bill to direct the accounting officers of the Treasury to credit the account of Lieutenant Jackson with the sum $1,271.34, amount obtained from him as property and disbursing officer of the Signal Service on false and fraudulent vouch-count of Lieutenant Jackson with the sum $1,271.34, amount obtained from num as property and disbursing officer of the Signal Service on false and fraudulent vouchers.

The record shows the frauds perpetrated to be the payment of one wholly frandulent voucher and the raising of two others to a larger amount, and payments made to Sergeant D. H. Sackett, Signal Service, on receipts presented by him which had also been raised, the total amount of all being the sum of $1,271.34.

It appears also from the record that in September, 1873, an agreement was made with one Matt. France, of Colorado Territory, for the delivery of sixty cords of wood on the summit of Pike's Peak, and Sergeant Sackett, in charge of that signal station, telegraphed that the wood had been delivered; whereupon vouchers were made out and sent to Mr. France for his signature, and when returned signed were duly paid. It was subsequently discovered that only forty-eight, in lieu of sixty, cords of wood were delivered, defrauding the Government of $264.

On December 2, 1873, Sergeant Sackett made an agreement with this same France to carry supplies to the summit of Pike's Peak; and on December 26 a statement of articles and weights carried by said France, under this agreement, was received from Sergeant Sackett, showing that France had transported 7,634½ pounds. Vouchers accordingly were made out, sent to France for signature, returned properly signed, and paid. It subsequently transpired that only 5,537 pounds were transported, involving a fraud upon the Government of $251.70.

The third fraud was perpetrated by Sergeant Sackett, in collusion with one G. M. Brown, of Colorado. Instructions had been sent Sergeant Sackett on the 18th of November, 1873, to hire two men to clear away dead timber from the telegraph line, from the summit of Pike's Peak to the base of the mountain, at $41 a day; and on the 1st of December authority was given him to increase this force to five, in order to expedite the work. Receipts were subsequently sent in by Sergeant S

Criminal proceedings have been instituted against France and Brown, and Sergeant Sackett was arrested, confined, and subsequently escaped, and is now a degoant Sackett was arrested, confined, and subsequently escaped, and is now a deserter.

Lieutenant Jackson, being the disbursing officer of the Signal Service, paid these vouchers, as shown by the record, in the ordinary line of his duty, and within and according to the rules and regulations of the Signal Service. All purchases for this service are paid and accounted for by him to the Treasury Department, and such purchases are made as necessity requires at all points in the United States where there are stations of observation. All purchases are audited in the office of the Chief Signal Officer in Washington.

When authority is given to purchase supplies or incur expense, the sergeant or other person in charge makes the purchase and sends in his receipt for the article, accompanied by the bill. The account is then audited, and, if found correct, vouchers are made out and transmitted, accompanied by a check, payable to he order of the proper party, to whom the sergeant delivers the check, upon signature of the vouchers, which are then returned, signed, to the office of the Chief Signal Officer by the purchasing sergeant.

In the cases of fraud here presented, the record shows that the mode of procedure as to purchasing and paying was in strict accord with the rules of the service, and that the money was obtained by conspiracy, cheat, and fraud, from which the disbursing officer had no means of protecting either the Government or himself. But for the vigilance of the officers of the Signal Service the frauds would not have been detected; but having been discovered, it becomes necessary to pass a bill to relieve Lieutenant Jackson, in order that his involved accounts with the Treasury may be settled. The difficulty or trouble originates in the fact that, in default of commissioned officers in the Signal Service, it becomes necessary to trust enlisted men to make purchases, who, while they may be honest or otherwise, cannot well be held to the same responsibility as commissioned officers. This is, however, the onl

Mr. LOGAN. A similar bill has passed the House of Representatives in the same wording precisely; and I ask that this Senate bill be laid aside and the House bill taken up and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the substitution of the House bill for the Senate bill just read. The Chair hears none.

The bill (H. R. No. 29) for the relief of First Lieutenant Henry Jackson, Seventh Cavalry, United States Army, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read

the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Senate bill will be postponed indefinitely. The Chair hears no objection.

AMOS B. FERGUSON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 82) for the relief of Amos B. Ferguson; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Paymaster-General of the Army to cause to be paid, out of any money appropriated or which may hereafter be appropriated for the payment of the Army of the United States, to Amos B. Ferguson, late second lieutenant, Eightieth New York Infantry Volunteers, (called, also, Twentieth New York State Militia,) a sun that shall be equal to the pay of a second lieutenant of infantry of the United States Army in active service, from the 22d of April, 1864, to the 26th of September, 1864, deducting therefrom any amount that he may have received as pay of a non-commissioned officer or private for the same period of time.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALBEMARLE AND CHESAPEAKE CANAL COMPANY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 464) for the relief of the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal Company; which was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Navy to investigate the claim of the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal Company for tolls on vessels transporting naval supplies, and to award such sum as he may find equitably due, not to exceed $3,742.20, the award to be in full payment of all claims of the company against the Government.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM S. ROBINSON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The two next bills on the Calendar being adverse reports will be laid over. Mr. WRIGHT. So far as the first case is concerned I consent, but as to the next one, unless there be some objection, I should like to have the adverse report concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next bill on the Calendar is the bill (S. No. 436) for the relief of William S. Robinson, of Malden, Massachusetts, which was reported adversely by the Committee on Claims.

The adverse report was concurred in, and the bill was indefinitely ## postponed.

WILLIAM L. ADAMS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 479) for the relief The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 479) for the relief of William L. Adams, late collector of customs at Astoria, Oregon; which was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the allowance to William L. Adams, late collector of the port of Astoria, in the district of Oregon, in the settlement of his accounts, so much of the public funds as were stolen from him and never paid into the Treasury while engaged in February, 1866, in conveying funds from his office in Astoria to San Francisco California, for the purpose of depositing the same with the United States assistant treasurer in that city, pursuant to the instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury. The sum so allowed is not to exceed $12,190.

Mr. SARGENT. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report submitted by Mr. Jones, of Florida, from the Committee on Claims, on the 23d of February:

The Secretary read the following report submitted by Mr. Jones, of Florida, from the Committee on Claims, on the 23d of February:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the case of William L. Adams, late collector of customs at the port of Astoria, Oregon, submit the following report:

This case has been before Congress since 1866. Two reports have been made in it; one by a committee of the Senate, the other by a committee of the House of Representatives. The claimant asks to be relieved from liability to the Government resulting from the loss of a sum of money in his possession as collector of enstoms, and which he was conveying from Astoria, Oregon, to San Francisco, California, under express instructions from the Treasury Department. There can be no doubt of the loss of the money by theft. A considerable portion of it was recovered from the persons who stole it, and there is not the slightest ground to suspect the honesty and good faith of the petitioner. The views expressed in the report of the Senate committee February 24, 1868, are such as would doubtless prevail in a court of law; but it is the severity of the law upon this subject which has compelled the petitioner to seek relief here, and your committee are of opinion that cases of this kind should not be decided by Congress according to legal rules, but by justice and equity. When the money was lost from the possession of the retitioner, he was transferring it to San Francisco in person, as directed by the Teasury Department. The evidence shows that he gave reasonable attention and care to the coin on board the steamer. He was not authorized to employ an assistant to accompany him, and he appears to have acted in the whole affair as a prudent, honest officer. The duty imposed upon Mr. Adams, by the order of the Treasury Department, was an unusual one. The collector was bound to keep safely the public moneys, and to pay them over as instructed by his superior at Washington; but in this case he was required to carry a large sum of money, in coin the Government. The money was carried in a wen-secured train, which was acred in the state-room of the petitioner. He states that he was never absent from his state-room except during meal-times.

It appears that while Adams was at breakfast, the morning before his arrival at San Francisco, the thief entered his room, which was locked, and pried off the bottom of the trunk and stole part of the money. The appearance of the trunk afforded no evidence of what had happened while he was at breakfast, and he did not miss the money until he reached San Francisco. It appears that the petitioner adopted every means in his power to detect the thief and recover the lost treasure. Some $3.000 of the stolen money was recovered at New York and San Francisco from the thieves, leaving a balance of $12,190 standing against Mr. Adams on the books of the Treasury on account of this loss. The Committee on Claims of the Senate made a report in favor of the petitioner during the second session of the Forty-third Congress, and your committee concur fully in all that is stated in that report, and are of opinion that Mr. Adams should be credited by the Treasury Department with the amount stolen from him, less the amount recovered from the persons who perpetrated the theft, and they report a bill for his relief.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HIBBEN & CO.

The bill (S. No. 490) for the relief of Hibben & Co., of Chicago, Illinois, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Hibben & Co. of $3,912.16, or so much thereof as they shall prove to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that they have expended in the purchase of revenue-stamps used by them to stamp manufactured tobacco, upon which a tax had been previously paid under the revenue laws in force at the time of its manufacture and sale, but which was made liable to be stamped under the act of July 20, 1868, thus requiring a double tax on the same tobacco.

Mr. SARGENT. Is there a report?
Mr. WITHERS. There is no such bill on the printed Calendar that is furnished us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that it was accidentally omitted by the clerk who made up the Calendar. It is now reached in the regular order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is there a report in the case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report, and it will be read if desired.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. JONES, of Nevada, from the Committee on Finance, on the 24th of February:

of Nevada, from the Committee on Finance, on the 24th of February:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of Hibben & Co., dealers in tobacco at Chicago, Illinois, praying for a refund of certain taxes as sessed and collected upon certain tobacco belonging to them upon which a previous tax had been paid, beg leave to report:

That, by the act of Congress entitled "An act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes," approved July 20, 1868, a change was made in the classification, rate of tax, and manner of packing and stamping manufactured tobacco, and it was provided that—

"After the 1st day of January, 1869, all smoking, fine-cut, chewing tobacco, or snuff, and, after the 1st day of July, 1869, all other manufactured tobacco of every description, shall be taken and deemed as having been manufactured after the passage of this act, and shall not be sold or offered for sale unless put up in packages and stamped as prescribed by this act, except at retail by retail dealers, from wooden packages, stamped as provided for in this act; and any person who shall sell or offer for sale, after the 1st day of January, 1869, any smoking, fine-cut, chewing tobacco, or snuff, and, after the 1st day of July, 1869, any other manufactured tobacco not so put up in packages and stamped, shall, on conviction, be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than $500 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years."

Section 78 of the act required dealers in manufactured tobacco, after the passage of the act, to make inventories monthly and return them to the assistant assessor, showing the amount of tobacco such dealer has remaining on hand, manufactured or

Section 78 of the act required dealers in manufactured tobacco, after the passage of the act, to make inventories monthly and return them to the assistant assessor, showing the amount of tobacco such dealer has remaining on hand, manufactured or imported, prior to the passage of the a ct, and not stamped.

The petitioners, Messrs. Hibben & Co., were dealers in manufactured tobacco in the city of Chicago, Illinois, and had on hand on the 15th day of February, 1869, 24,451 pounds of smoking-tobacco on which the tax of fifteen cents per pound had been assessed and paid thereon prior to the passage of the law of July 20, 1868.

As appears from the affidavits of George Hibben, one of the partners of the firm of Hibben & Co., and of A. L. Robinson, a member of the firm of A. L. Robinson & Co., who manufactured the tobacco in question, and from the records of the collector of internal revenue of the fifth collection district of Kentucky, the identical tobacco thus held by Messrs. Hibben & Co., upon which an internal-revenue tax had already been paid, was, on the 15th day of February, put up in packages and stamped as required by law; and said Hibben & Co. paid the sum of $3,912.16 to the United States collector of the first district of Illinois for tobacco-stamps affixed by them to such tobacco.

The affidavits accompanying the petition show that Messrs. Hibben & Co. used due diligence to dispose of such tobacco before the expiration of the time within which it was lawful to sell said tobacco without the same being stamped, and without an additional tax being paid thereon, and that it was impossible to place the tobacco upon the market without procuring stamps therefor and putting the same in packages as required by the provisions of the law then in force.

The act reduced the tax on some classes of tobacco, increasing the rate on that held by the petitioner from fifteen cents per pound, the injustice of imposing another tax upon tobacco which had already paid a similar tax is palpable. Such a tax paid, imposed alike vided that such spirits having already paid a tax, should not be required to pay an additional tax.

Such a provision would, doubtless, have been inserted in this act in regard to manufactured tobacco, had it not seemed probable that all manufactured tobacco on hand at the time of the passage of the act could and would be disposed of and consumed before it became unlawful to sell such tobacco without being stamped as required by the law.

Your committee are of the opinion that in a case where manufactured tobacco and snuff, on which all prior taxes and assessments had been paid, have remained in the possession of the dealer without his own fault or negligence after it became unlawful, without paying an additional tax thereon, to dispose of such tobacco or snuff, it is equitable and just to refund the additional tax so paid; and they therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Will an objection carry this bill over.

Mr. SARGENT. Will an objection carry this bill over. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope it will not be objected to.
Mr. SARGENT. It seems to me this may be one of a very large class of cases. Certain time was given to work off the stock of to-bacco on hand. After that time all tobacco in the market was subbacco on hand. After that time all tobacco in the market was subjected to an additional tax. This was not worked off. Therefore an equity is raised that the parties ought to be relieved from the operation of the law by which they were compelled to pay the additional tax. I do not see why that may not have happened in every city of the United States. If this were a single case standing by itself, so that there would not be any danger of depleting the Treasury by some hundreds of thousands or millions of dollars hereafter, I certainly should hesitate to interpose an objection; but I am afraid of the precedent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator object to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SARGENT. I think I shall have to do so

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Will the Senator withdraw his objection? Mr. SARGENT. I will to hear the Senator. Mr. JONES, of Nevada. The matter was referred to the Finance Committee, and they came to the conclusion that there were but very few cases of that character in this country, and the bill is so drawn that it is referred to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to decide how much may be due these parties. It is not believed that there are many cases where a double tax has been paid. It looks like a flagrant violation of the first principles of justice that where a tax on a large amount of tobacco has been paid, before the parties have had time to dispose of it, an additional tax should be laid so as to cause a very heavy loss. The committee were unanimous in their opinion that this was a just claim; but, to make sure that they were right in the premises, the bill is so drawn, as will be seen by reading it, as to refer the matter to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to take such proofs and to allow such amount as in his judgment may seem equitable and just. I hope that the bill will pass.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no objection to the form of the bill; I think the provision requiring further testimony is a very good guard in the bill; but I can see no evidence that the committee could have had or considered that this is not one of a large class of cases. I do not see why a great many other people may not have had tobacco which they could not sell and on which they subsequently paid the increased tax. If you allow such a claim in one instance all these other creased tax. If you allow such a claim in one instance all these other cases will develop themselves, and instead of paying back a few hundreds of dollars here we may find that the amount is very large indeed that we shall be required to pay under this precedent. There certainly is no law requiring the United States to pay it. The construction of the statutes is plain enough. This tobacco, under the statutes, was liable to this additional tax; but an equity is raised because the person did not succeed in selling in time the large stock of tobacco he had. Unquestionably, to my mind, there must have been other large stocks of tobacco in the same condition on which the tax was placed. It is, therefore, a question of considerable moment. For that reason I think we should be very cautious in passing such a bill.

Mr. McDONALD. I hope the Senator from California will withdraw his objection. This bill first went to the Committee on Claims, and after an examination there, thinking that it did not properly belong to them, but having so far examined it as to be satisfied of its being correct and right, they had it referred to the Committee on It underwent examination there, and it was reported unanimously by that committee.

I have not examined carefully the frame of the bill, but I understand it is quite well guarded against any fraudulent claim. The Commissioner of the Internal Revenue is to be satisfied that the claim is right and just and that this tax has been twice paid, before any refunding can take place. It seems to me that to continue this case over by objection would be to put the parties to a very great hardship in what seems to be a very equitable remedy. I hope the objection will be withdrawn and that the Senate will now consider

Mr. LOGAN. I deem this a very meritorious bill. The objection. made by the Senator from California that it is only one of a class of cases which may probably involve the Government in a large expenditure of money for the purpose of repaying to these people the duplicate tax which they have paid is founded in a mistake. It only incate tax which they have paid is founded in a mistake. It only involves the payment of money to persons who acted honestly under the law, and I think he will find very few cases coming before Congress asking for a refunding of this tax. If a firm who had a large amount of tobacco on hand at the time were disposed to avoid the amount of tobacco on hand at the time were disposed to avoid the tax, it was very easy for them to transfer it and put it out of their hands, make a sale to some other party, and thereby avoid the double tax. But where parties who had tobacco on hand acted fairly and honestly and tried to sell their tobacco, and inasmuch as they did not sell it, but retained it, had then to pay the additional tax, it was certainly a great hardship. Surely a great Government like this will not ask a man to pay a tax twice and then refuse to refund the duplicate tay. duplicate tax.
Parties in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue who have examined this claim think that it is a fair one, an equitable one at least; but they were not willing to pay it because the law required the double tax. It is, however, considered proper to refer it back to the double tax. It is, however, considered proper to refer it back to the Commissioner to let him examine the question, and on that examination let whatever amount is due to this firm on account of having paid a double tax be refunded to them. They paid three thousand and odd dollars in this way. I know the firm very well. Of course that is not evidence, for I am not giving testimony; but I know they are honest mep. They complied with the law fully; and because they are of that class of men I am at least willing to stand up here and say that they ought to be repaid the tax which they paid in dublicate.

As is said in the report, when you put the tax on whisky you excepted tobacco from the same rule there applied. You required a man, if he did not sell his tobacco by a certain time, to pay a double tax. No one will say that it is honest and fair to an individual who has an amount of stock on hand of any character, if he cannot sell it by a certain time to pay a double tax for not selling it. I think a man would be better able to pay double if he could sell than if he could not sell. It struck me at the time the law passed that it was unjust. I tried to prevent it, but I could not do it. It struck me then as a very inequitable way of dealing with the citizens of the country, to require them to sell their property at a certain time, or else pay the Government extra because they did not sell it. That is this whole case. If a man paid the tax to the Government, because he did not find purchasers at a certain time he had to pay it over again. That is the law. That is all there is in the case. If any man will say that that is an honest transaction, I am willing that this bill shall be defeated. I cannot see it in that light. I think the Government should deal honestly with its citizens; and honestly these men are entitled to this money if they prove to the satisfaction of the Commissioner that they paid the tax twice, which I have no doubt they will do.

Mr. BAYARD. I had some cause to examine this case at one time in committee. The facts were undoubted that the manufacturer had fully complied with the existing laws; he had paid for the stamps upon his manufactured tobacco to the full extent required by existing law. It pleased Congress afterward to change that law, and not to give him credit upon this highly taxed manufacture for the amount of stamps that he had already put upon it by a prior law, and yet compelled him to stamp it a second time under a new law. I have no question that had it been deemed safe as a general measure, Congress would have remitted all the taxes theretofore paid on the tobacco, and left tobacco subject to a single tax, which, God knows, was high enough in proportion to the value of the article. But in this case, after paying the tax under what I may call the old law, and honestly and fully affixing all the stamps required, Congress changed the law, imposed new and other taxes, and compelled that same tobacco to pay imposed new and other taxes, and compelled that same tobacco to pay a double tax. As that was not capable of remedy, or at least as it was not thought safe to establish a general remedy and exclude tobacco formerly taxed owing to some question as to what might be the stock on hand, the committee, as I well remember, said that any hardship that might be worked under the law would be capable of remedy by special acts in special cases. That is precisely one of those. The party in question has sought to avoid no law of the United States, but has been made the victim of a change of the law by having a double tax imposed upon the same commodity. Therefore in equity the Department recognized that he should be relieved, but they had no legal authority to relieve him without this new act of Congress. For that reason this bill was reported, and for that reason I trust it will pass. will pas will pass.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not wish to stand in the ungracious position of objecting to the consideration of bills, and I shall withdraw my objection to the Senate considering this bill, leaving it, however, to the vote of the Senate. But while doing that I do not change my mind as to the safety of this legislation as a precedent. I am not questioning the honesty of these parties; and I desire my friend from Illinois to understand that distinctly. A protestation of their honesty consequently does not help the bill. I dare say their claim is honest, so thinks the Senator from Illinois; so think the committee. honest; so thinks the Senator from Illinois; so think the committee, and other gentlemen who know these parties. The point I make is that it is unsafe as a precedent. There may be a great many honest claims, in the same sense of the word "honest," pressed upon the Treasury and upon Congress; and this precedent will prevent our

It is well known that a year or two ago, by a construction of a stat-ute, by insisting that the absence of a comma was of some account, some millions of dollars were taken out of the Treasury of the United States. At the time that decision was made by the Secretary of the Treasury, I doubt if he supposed that more than five or ten thousand dollars were involved in the decision. These cases come the little end first. It is the small end of the wedge which is entered, and the crevice that is made in the Treasury is larger and larger the further the wedge goes in. It seems to me that we have the small end of the wedge presented to us here, and the question is whether we shall give the first blow that will drive it in.

Mr. LOGAN. Allow me to make a statement to the Senator, so that he may see that perhaps it is not so dangerous as he may imagine. It has been some time since this law went into effect, and there have been only three cases that I know of presented to the Senate for re-lief: one case that was acted on in the last Congress, this case, and one other. These are the only cases that I have known presented to Congress in reference to this double tax on tobacco, and they are not for large amounts, and yet there has been a long time for opportunity to present them.

Mr. SARGENT. Were the other bills passed?

Mr. LOGAN. One passed last session, and there is one other pending this session.

Mr. SARGENT. Did that become a law?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SARGENT. It is not accurate to say that this is a double tax, Mr. SARGENT. It is not accurate to say that this is a double tax, that the party was required to pay the tax twice. The amount of tax the party paid originally he was not required to pay over again. The amount of the tax, say, was twenty cents, increased to twenty-four, and he was only required to pay the four cents additional tax. He had full credit for the amount that he originally paid; and the to-bacco on which he paid the additional four cents went out in the market after the period of limitation had expired on exactly the same footing as other tobacco at that time paying twenty-four cents. was equal then with everybody else who put tobacco on the market, and the time given by the law was quite long to work up old stock. It seems to me no hardship was intended by the law, and really very ittle could have been worked.

Mr McDONALD. My understanding is entirely different from that of the Senator from California. I understand that the tax in this case in the first instance was sixteen cents a pound; that the law then provided that all tobacco which was not disposed of by a given date should be restamped and the new tax exacted on it, notwithstanding The new tax was fifteen cents a pound. it had paid the former tax. so that upon the day when this provision took effect all tobacco then on hand that had already paid the sixteen-cent tax had to pay again the fifteen-cent tax. This application is to recover back that payment thus made. This exaction of the law was a penalty on the party holding the tobacco for not selling it before that date.

Mr. SARGENT. The law has been sent for, and it is quite possible the Senator may be correct. Several Senators around me, however, are of a different opinion, and I will not speak positively of it, because my memory about it is not accurate; but I would say that even in that case a person who put the tobacco on the market after the time limited had all the length of time which the statute provided for any one to dispose of his tobacco.

Mr. McDONALD. That did not seem to be sufficient in this case, and the parties did not dispose of their tobacco, evidently because they could not in that time. Then in order to be able to sell it after that it became necessary for them to pay this new tax, which made the tax upon their tobacco nearly double that which was imposed on that which was imposed on that which came into market after the new law came into effect.

Mr. SARGENT. If there were any certainty that this bill would be the end of the matter, I would make no strentious objection to it, because I believe in respecting the equities of our citizens. Tax laws are necessarily stringent and harsh in their operation. There is very great complaint even of their natural and ordinary operation. debt which we pay with the least willingness is our taxes either to the State's or the United States Treasury; and necessarily there is some complaint and unquestionably often hardship. But it is a very serious thing whether we can afford to deplete the Treasury by a precedent which may have the effect to call upon us hereafter to take hundreds of thousands of dollars from it. For that reason I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. BOGY. I wish to ascertain one fact which will determine my yote. Some of the Senators here state that this is a double tax; that is, that the old tax of twenty cents a pound was paid when that was the law, and then when the law was changed, making the tax twenty-four cents, another tax of twenty-four cents had to be paid. That statement is made by the Senator from Illinois and also by the Senator from Delaware as the fact of this case. If it be true of this case, it would be true of many other cases. The Senator from California, who seems to be familiar with the subject, denies that to be the fact, and says that only the additional tax of four cents was paid. These facts we wish to ascertain, because it could not have been the intention of Congress to require any person in this country to pay a double tax. We certainly did not intend that; and if that be the construction of the law, the sooner we remedy our great mistake the better. But I wish to know the fact.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that this law, as I remember, was passed in 1868. I do not think it changed the rate of tax, though perhaps it did in a small degree on smoking-The rates were sixteen and thirty-two cents. law of 1868. At a certain time, any manufacturer selling tobacco unstamped was liable to a penalty; and, of course, a certain time was given to the manufacturers to work off their tobacco. In this particular case, and one or two others that I remember, the parties were nlar case, and one or two others that I remember, the parties were unable to sell the stock on hand within the time. They could not after the time sell the tobacco unstamped, because, if they did, they were liable to a penalty. Therefore, in order to sell their tobacco they were obliged to affix the stamps. They could not affix the stamps without buying them. Therefore, if any tobacco existed at the expiration of this time unstamped upon which the tax had been paid of course there was a double payment of the tax of the tax or passals. been paid, of course there was a double payment of the tax or no sale of the tobacco. I understand that to be this case. If that is so, it seems to me these gentlemen have an equity. I remember very well the circumstances that occurred at the time of the passage of the act. The act was passed in 1868, and had no relation to a different rate of

Mr. BOGY. I understand this case arises under an act we passed

Mr. BOGY. I do not so understand. I understand it arises under the act of 1868, and that it is a claim arising under that.

Mr. BOGY. I heard the law quoted first in reference to the tax of twenty and twenty-four cents. I know twenty-four cents was fixed by ourselves a year or so ago.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it has no relation to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have the law before me. The change in the mode of levying the tax on tobacco was made by the general revenue law of 1868, passed July 20, I think. It is a very long law. The sixty-second section provides for an entirely radical change in the mode of levying the tax. Up to that time the tax had been levied at the manufactory, and not accompanied by stamps. Under the sixty-second section of this act it is provided-

That from and after the passage of this act all manufactured tobacco shall be put up and prepared by the manufacturer for sale, or removal for sale or consumption, in packages of the following description, and in no other manner:

All snuff in packages containing one, two, four, six, eight, and sixteen ounces, or in bladders containing not exceeding ten pounds each, or in jars containing not exceeding twenty pounds.

Each of these packages had to have a stamp of a certain particular description that did not exist before. I do not think the tobacco tax was raised materially by this act. It was raised in some matters by this law and lowered in others. I think the general effect of this law was rather to lower the tax on tobacco. This only applied to the to-bacco manufactured after the passage of the act. All manufactured tobacco had to be put up in this form with stamps, and the stamps were to follow it until it was consumed. Then there was added to the law, in order to provide for the tobacco on hand, this clause:

After the 1st day of January, 1869-

Six months after the passage of the act-

all smoking, fine-cut chewing-tobacco, or snuff, and, after the 1st day of July, 1869, all other manufactured tobacco of every description, shall be taken and deemed as having been manufactured after the passage of this act, and shall not be sold or offered for sale unless put up in packages and stamped as prescribed by this act.

So we required that all tobacco manufactured after the passage of the act should pay a certain tax, and defined the mode and manner of collecting it. All the tobacco manufactured before that time which was not sold until six months afterward was to pay that same tax over again. In other words, a double tax was exacted. Therefore the Senator from Indiana is perfectly correct in saying that the tax imposed in this case was a double tax; that is, these gentlemen swear that in February, 1869, they had in their possession so many pounds of tobacco that had been manufactured before the 1st of July, 1868, and they thereupon were required under the law (as it was clearly the duty of the officer to require) to pay over $3,912.16 which they say they did. Undoubtedly that was an addition to the tax they say they did. Undoubtedly that was an addition to the tax that was levied by law at the time the tobacco was manufactured; it was an entirely new tax.

Mr. BAYARD. Did it not subject that identical tobacco to more tax than any other? It had to be stamped at that time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; newly manufactured tobacco would only pay the tax imposed by this act, but this tobacco being old tobacco had to pay the tax imposed by the previous act and also the tax affixed by this act. The reason of that is obvious. It was absolutely indispensable in order to collect our revenue on tobacco that we should put out of existence as soon as possible the old manufactured tobacco; otherwise our revenue officers could not detect whether or not tobacco on the market had been tax-paid or not. The purpose of this law was that after the 1st of January, 1869, any officer might go into any cigar-shop and ascertain whether or not the tax had been paid by seeing whether or not the tobacco bore the stamps that were required by law. If it did, that was the evidence of its payment; and in order to accomplish that we had to get rid of and drive out of the market all tobacco manufactured before the passage of the act, because that had not been stamped as evidence of the payment The result was that we imposed a double tax on all that was not sold at the period fixed; but it was believed at the time the law was passed that six months was ample to allow the manufactured tobacco to be consumed; that is the average; and certain classes of tobacco, snuff, &c., were allowed a year, but after that time they had to pay this stamp tax.

There is a good deal of force in the objection stated by the Senator from California that if we pass this bill not only meritorious claims will arise but fraudulent claims will arise. You can see how every manufacturer of tobacco would force into consumption and use all that he had on hand manufactured before the 1st of July, 1868, because he would know that if he had it on hand six months afterward he would have to pay a double tax. It would be a disadvantage to him; it would be a practical confiscation of his property; and therefore I have no doubt that the great body of it was sold, but it seems in this particular instance satisfactory proof has been made that there was a certain amount not sold. When this bill went to the Committee on Finance, I remember very well that we considered it carefully and cautiously. We doubted very much whether we ought to pass it, but at the same time we could see clearly that it was manifestly due to these men that it was an equitable claim; that if they could not sell the tobacco we had imposed a double tax on it; and therefore the the tobacco we had imposed a double tax on it; and therefore the Committee on Finance thought it was better to take the risk. Many good cases ought not to arise, but there may be fraudulent cases presented; and we were compelled to choose between denying a man an honest claim and being liable to be imposed upon by fraudulent claims. That is precisely the condition we are placed in by the pasage of the bill. On the whole, we do not think many cases of the kind can arise. The very fact that they are presented at this late date will excite suspicion against them and cause controversy. This bill refers the whole matter to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. bill refers the whole matter to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who would be likely to impose very strict rules of evidence.

Mr. LOGAN. This case has been presented before the Commissioner of Internal Revenue three or four years since. It has been before the Senate some time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, and I ought to state another fact, that the law required a monthly inventory to be made of the tobacco on hand, so that they have in the records of the Department a means by which they can check any fraudulent claims. The manufacturers of tobacco were compelled to return every month the amount on hand, and consequently if they should make claims now we should be able to present to them their inventories sworn to by them from time to time, and to that extent we can check any fraudulent claims. On the whole I do not think there can be any very large amount of claims presented under this law. It is now nearly eight years since they arose, and we have these guards and checks. It seems to me pretty hard to refuse to pay this man a claim when he can make proof clearly and satisfactorily, not only to Congress, but to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM S. ROBINSON.

Mr. INGALLS. When I was temporarily in the chair a short time since, on the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] the bill (S. No. 436) for the relief of William S. Robinson, of Malden, Massachusetts, was indefinitely postponed. It has recurred to my recollection since I took my seat that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] spoke to me in regard to bills that were upon the Calendar with an adverse report and asked me if they did not go over without further suggestion. There is no doubt, from what he said, that he left the Chamber supposing the bill would not be called up; and in order to protect myself against the suspicion of having been inattentive or negligent in this matter I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed may be reconsidered and that the bill go upon the Calendar.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to make one remark in that connection. Of course it is impossible that I can remember what connection each Senator may have with a bill. I remember now, my attention being directed to it, that upon the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, who is absent from the city, [Mr. Dawes,] this case was retered to the Calendar. I think therefore it is but fair to him (a fact stored to the Calendar. I think therefore it is but fair to him (a fact that did not occur to me at the time I asked that the adverse report be concurred in) that this order be set aside by unanimous consent and the case remain on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the reconsideration of the vote by which this bill was indefinitely postponed? The Chair hears none.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask that the bill go on the Calendar as it was before that action was had.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It takes its place on the Calendar as it was before.

Mr. McCREERY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 2, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the provisions of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1875, a report of Major W. E. Merrill on continuation and completion of the Chesa-peake and Ohio Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS IN QUARTERMASTER AND COMMISSARY DEPARTMENTS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting to the House, in response to a resolution of the 14th February, a report of the Acting Quartermaster-General on the amount of claims allowed and rejected by the Quartermaster Department and Commissary Department under the act of July 4, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

C. C. HUTCHINSON.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a House resolution of the 21st ultimo, a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in relation to the defalcation of C. C. Hutchinson, late United States agent for the Ottawa Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ALLOTMENTS OF LANDS TO INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs relative to allotments of lands to certain bands of Indians, and a draught of a bill providing for such legislation as may be necessary to that end; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CONTESTED ELECTION-SEAL VS. LYNCH.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has received this morning testimony in the contested-election case of Roderick Seal against John R. Lynch, from the State of Mississippi, which, if there be no objection, will be referred to the Committee on Elections, without printing.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

AMENDMENT TO REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, reported, as a substitute for House bills Nos, 1676 and 1678, a bill (H. R. No. 2449) to supply an omission and to amend section 1480 of the Revised Statutes; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

TREATY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. MORRISON, by unanimous consent, presented and asked leave to have printed the views of the minority of the Ways and Means Committee to accompany the bill (H. R. No. 212) to carry into effect the proposed treaty between the United States and the Hawaiian

There was no objection, and the order to print was made.

PRINTING AND ENGRAVING BUREAU OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. RANDALL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2450) to provide for a deficiency in the service of the Printing and Engraving Bureau of the Treasury Department and for the issue of the silver coinage of the United States in place of the fractional currency; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to have the bill read.

The bill was read.

The first section appropriates the sum of $163,000 to provide for en-craying and printing and other expenses in making and issuing United

The second section directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue silver coin of the United States of the denomination of ten, twenty, twenty-five, and fifty cents, standard value, in redemption of the full amount of fractional currency, whether the same be now in the Treasury awaiting redemption or whenever it may be presented for redemption.

It provides further that the Secretary of the Treasury may, under the regulations of the Treasury Department, provide for such re-demption and issue by the substitution, at the regular subtreasuries and public depositories of the United States, until the whole amount of fractional currency outstanding shall be redeemed.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to state, under instructions from the committee, that I will call this bill up at the first opportunity. I desire further to state, under instructions from the committee, that the question of extending the amount of legal-tenders for silver was not, in their judgment, within the province of our committee, but they did discuss the subject; and they also instructed me to say that they will permit an amendment to be offered, either from the Committee of Ways and Means or from the Committee on Banking and Currency when this bill shall come up for consideration, to increase the amount of legal-tenders and silver coin. I ask unanimous consent that when the bill comes up for consideration it shall be considered

Mr. PAGE. I would like to ask the gentleman to admit an amendment to allow the issue of coin of twenty cents.

Mr. RANDALL. That is already in the bill. If the gentleman had Mr. RANDALL. That is already in the bill. If the gentleman had listened to its reading he would have found it was there. At the suggestion of the Speaker, I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations, and when that motion is agreed to I will enter a motion to reconsider. I would further ask unanimous consent that when the bill is reported back it shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDALL entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted.

And then, no objection being made, it was ordered that when the bill was reported back from the Committee on Appropriations it should be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

PENSION CLAIMS IN MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi, by unanimous consent, submitted the Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Commissioner of Pensions be required to furnish information as to the number of applications of colored claimants filed in his office from the State of Mississippi, the number allowed, the number rejected, and the number unsettled and the cause of delay in adjudicating all those unsettled; if awaiting investigation, the steps taken to secure such investigation, the number of agents employed for that purpose, and the number of claims investigated by such agents.

THOMAS CRAWFORD.

Mr. NEW, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2451) restoring the name of Thomas Crawford, a soldier of the Mexican war, to the pension-roll; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several members called for the order of business The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour begins at half past twelve o'clock, and the regular order this morning is the calling of committees for reports of a public nature, and the call rests with the Committee on Public Lands.

ENTRIES OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. SAYLER, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2039) to amend sections 2450 and 2451, and to repeal section 2452, title 32, chapter 11, of the Revised Statutes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatipes of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That hereafter the Secretary of the Interior shall perform all the duties which were delegated to the Secretary of the Treasury by sections 2450 and 2451, title 32, chapter 11, of the Revised Stututes of the United sections 2450 and 2451, title 52, empter 12, or public lands in which the Commissioner States.

SEC. 2. Thatall suspended entries of the public lands in which the Commissioner of the General Land Office has decided that patents shall issue, and which have been confirmed by the Secretary of the Interior and the Attorney-General, are hereby declared valid to the same extent as though confirmed by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney-General, as prescribed in the aforesaid sections 2450 and 2451.

the Treasury and the Arthury and 2451.

SEC. 3. That section 2452, title 32, chapter 11, of the Revised Statutes, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. SAYLER. In order that this bill may be fully understood and that it may occupy as little time as possible in its passage, I will briefly explain its provisions. The sections sought to be amended are 2450 and 2451 of the Revised Statutes, which constitute the Secretary of the Treasury, the Attorney-General, and the Commissioner of the Land Office a board to establish regulations for and to supervise the adjudication by the Commissioner of all cases of supervised the adjudication by the Commissioner of all cases of supervised the supervised that the supervised the sup of the Land Once a board to establish regulations for and to super-vise the adjudication by the Commissioner of all cases of suspended entries of public lands and of suspended pre-emption land-claims. It is the purpose of the bill to substitute the words "the Secretary of the Interior" for the words "the Secretary of the Treasury." The mistake in the revision seems to have grown out of the fact that the original act establishing this board, passed in 1846 and prior to the establishment of the Interior Department, named the Secretary of the Treasury as a member of the board.

In 1849 the Department of the Interior was established. By the third section of the act establishing this Department it is provided that the Secretary of the Interior shall perform all duties, in relation to the General Land Office, of supervision and appeal, then discharged by the Secretary of the Treasury. In 1853, without any recognition whatever of the establishment of the Interior Department in 1849, whatever of the establishment of the Interior Department in 1643, the act of 1846, which had been limited in its operation to two years, was revived in all its provisions and extended for a period of ten years; and in 1856 it was made perpetual. It seems that the commissioners of revision, without reference to the act establishing the Interior Department, simply followed the acts of 1846, 1853, and 1856, and throughout their revision used the words "Secretary of the Treasury" as a member of this board instead of the words "Secretary of the Interior". of the Interior." As a matter of fact the Secretary of the Treasury has never had anything whatever to do with these adjudications; he has never, and very properly, served upon this board. The Secretary of the Interior, up to the present time, has discharged all of the duties. The enactment of the revision of the laws would seem to throw some doubt upon these adjudications, and it is therefore thought best by the Committee on Public Lands that the second section of this bill shall be adopted, in order to confirm these adjudications and to render them valid beyond all question.

The third section of the bill provides for the repeal of section 2452, which directs that the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall report to Congress, at the first session after any such adjudications have been made, a list of the same under the conditions prescribed by have been made, a list of the same under the conditions prescribed by law. I hold in my hand a list which was reported to Congress after the adoption of the revision of the statutes. No such lists have been reported before for a long number of years. Reports were made under the act of 1846, but under the acts reviving that act it seems to have been omitted. I do not believ that there is anything in the act of 1853 or in the act of 1856 which even by implication repeals the provision of the act of 1846 requiring such report and publication. Yet the fact is that it has fallen into disuse; it conveys information of no great importance, and is a matter of considerable labor and considerable expense. It is the opinion of the Department, and it is the unanimous oninion of the Committee, that report might as well be unanimous opinion of the Committee, that report might as well be dispensed with.

Mr. Speaker, unless some gentleman has a question to ask or an objection to interpose, I will call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SAYLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

The latter motion was agreed to.

TIMBER CULTURE.

Mr. SAYLER, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 2427) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend an act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies," approved March 13, 1874.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of merica in Congress assembled, That section 3 of the act entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to encourage the growth of timber on the western prairies'" is hereby amended by adding hereto the following further proviso: "Provided further. That whenever a party holding a claim under the provisions of this act, or whenever making final proof under the same, shall prove, by two good and credible witnesses, that the trees planted and growing on said claim were destroyed by grasshoppers during any one or more years while holding said claim, said year or years in which said trees were so destroyed shall not work any forfeiture of any of the rights or privileges conferred by this act; and the time allowed by this act in which to plant the trees and make final proof shall be extended the same number of years as the trees planted on the said claim were destroyed in the manner specified in this section."

SEC. 2. That the planting of seeds, nats, or cuttings shall be considered a compliance with the provisions of the timber-culture act: Provided, That such seeds, nuts, or cuttings of the kind and for the purpose contemplated in the original act shall be properly and well planted, the pround properly prepared and cultivated; and in case such seeds, nuts, or cuttings should not germinate and grow, or should be destroyed by the depredations of grasshoppers, or from other inevitable accident, that the ground shall be replanted or the vacancies filled within one year from the first planting: Provided further, That parties claiming the benefit of the provisions of this act shall prove, by two good and credible witnesses, that the ground was properly prepared and planted in such seeds, nuts, or cuttings, and were so destroyed by inevitable accident in such year.

SEC. 3. That it shall not be necessary to plant the trees, seeds, nuts, or cuttings in one body, provided the several bodies planted by measurement aggregate the amount required and in the time required by the original and amended act.

Mr. SAYLER. This bill is reported as a substitute for House bill

Mr. SAYLER. This bill is reported as a substitute for House bill No. 625 and House bill No. 643. It is substantially a reproduction of the provisions in those bills, with certain guards which in the opinion of the committee are important. The first section of this bill simply gives protection to those unfortunate people who have been subjected to the plague of the grasshopper. It provides that in the year in which such plague comes upon them, destroying the trees they have attempted to cultivate, shall not be counted against them as under the timber-culture act.

The second section of the bill provides that the planting of seeds, nuts, or cuttings under proper restriction, as set forth in the section, shall be regarded as a compliance with the timber-culture act. The former Commissioner of Public Lands, in a decision which he gave upon this question, decided substantially that the use of seeds in a proper manner was a substantial compliance with the timber-culture act. But as some doubts have existed and some uncertainty has attended the question, and as it is one of great importance to those directly interested, the committee have thought best to propose direct legislation, sanctioning the use of seeds, nuts, and cuttings, and guard-ing their use by such conditions, limitations, and restrictions as will prevent abuse.

The purpose of the third section is this: The original timber-culture The purpose of the third section is this: The original timber-culture act provides that of the one hundred and sixty acres, or whatever proportion of one hundred and sixty acres the settler may choose to take up, one-fourth shall be planted in trees in a body. For instance, if a man moving west takes up one hundred and sixty acres of land, under the timber-culture act he is required, as that act now stands, to plant forty acres in trees in a body. This, in some instances, gives rise to difficulty and is a matter of inconvenience. The committee cannot understand why the settler may not be permitted to plant two pieces of twenty acres or four pieces of twenty acres or four pieces of the acres. In other words so pieces of twenty acres or four pieces of ten acres. In other words, so long as he plants the number of acres required under the timber-culture act, it would seem to be a matter of very little importance whether he cultivates his timber in a single body or in several dif-whether he cultivates his timber in a single body of in several dif-ferent bodies. These are, briefly, the provisions of the bill.

I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL.]

Mr. DUNNELL. The original bill to which this is amendatory was introduced into this House by myself during the Forty-second Congress; and the first section of this substitute was in a bill which I gress; and the first section of this substitute was in a bill which I had the honor to introduce during the present session.

I can see no possible objection to this bill as it has been amended, liberal as it is, (and I am glad that it is so,) because under the tree-culture act there have already sprung up in many of the western towns forestry associations and tree-planting has become popular throughout the length and breadth of those States. In my own State the people have readily availed themselves of the provisions of the law on this subject.

I think, however, that the third section, which provides that the trees, &c., planted need not be in one body, but may be in several bodies, would be improved by inserting after the word "bodies" the words "not exceeding four." With this modification I think the provision would be free from all liability to abuse.

Mr. SAYLER. I have no objection to that amendment. Mr. DUNNELL. I move, then, to amend in the manner I have indicated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and

Mr. SAYLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FORFEITED RAILROAD LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. GOODIN, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1771) to declare forfeited to the United States certain lands granted to the State of Kansas in aid of the construction of railroads by act of Congress approved March 3, 1863.

The bill was read. It provides that all lands which were granted by act of Congress approved March 6, 1863, to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of a railroad commencing at Leavenworth, Kansas, and running, by way of the town of Lawrence and the Ohio City crossing of the Osage River, to the southern line of the State, in the direction of Galveston Bay, in Texas, with a branch from Lawrence, by the valley of the Wakarusa River, to a point on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad, where the road intersects the Neosho River, and which have not been patented to said railroad company by the United States under the grant, which has expired by limitation of law, are thereby declared forfeited to the United States, and shall hereafter be subject to entry only under the provisions of the homestead laws of the United States.

Mr. GOODIN. Mr. Speaker, in the year 1863 there was granted by act of Congress to the State of Kansas, in aid of the construction of certain railroads named in the act, a large amount of public lands.

Among the railroads to be benefited by the act was a road to be constructed from the city of Leavenworth, by the way of the city of Lawrence to the Ohio City crossing of the Osage River, (now the city of Ottawa,) to the south line of the State, in the direction of Galveston Bay. In aid of that road every alternate section of land was granted within ten miles on either side of the proposed road, and in order to make the amount equal to every alternate section within the ten-mile limit, there was also an indemnity grant extending ten miles far-ther on each side, equal to the amount of land which might have been previously selected and entered under the various laws of Congress.

The railroad company was to have ten years in which to complete the construction of its road. That time expired, of course, on the 3d day of March, 1873. The road has been constructed from the city of Lawrence to the southern boundary of the State; but it has never been completed from the city of Leavenworth to the city of Lawrence. Hence, as I take it, under the provisions of the act of Congress the company on the 3d day of March, 1873, had forfeited to the United States all the lands remaining unsold at the period last

The Commissioner of the General Land Office, in a case which was before the Interior Department on appeal from the local land office at Independence, Kansas, said, referring to the act of March 3, 1863:

The act making the grant provides that if any portion of the road is not completed within ten years from the passage of the act, no further sale of lands shall be made, and the lands unsold shall revert to the United States. The ten years expired March 3, 1873. The act provides that the road shall be constructed from the city of Leavenworth, by the way of the town of Lawrence, to the southern line of the State, in the direction of Galveston Bay, in Texas.

There is on file in this Office a map of constructed road from Lawrence to the southern boundary of the State of Kansas. This map is certified by the governor of Kansas, according to law, under date of September 21, 1871. There is no evidence on file in this Office that the road has been constructed from Leavenworth to Lawrence, as required by the act of Congress; and the time having expired, it must be considered that by the failure of the company to comply with the terms of the law a forfeiture results of its claim to the lands within the indemnity limits of the grant, and said lands have reverted to the United States.

After this decision was rendered by the Commissioner of the General Land Office I communicated with the Interior Department, with the view of getting a proclamation from the Secretary of the Interior declaring the reversion of the lands to the United States and the opening of them to settlement and entry; and for the purpose of giving the House a full understanding of the matter, I will read my letter to the late Secretary of the Interior, a copy of which is before me:

Humboldt, Kansas, September 14, 1875.

Humboldt, Kansas, September 14, 1875.

**Sir: I desire to call your attention to a subject of grave interest to many of my constituents, as well as the people of the State at large, and to ask for such action by your Department as may be deemed by you proper in the premises.

By act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, a large portion of the public domain was granted to the State of Kansas in aid of the construction of certain railroads, among which was a road running via Lawrence and the Ohio City crossing of the Osage River to the south line of the State of Kansas, in the direction of aleveston, Texas, now familiarly known as the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad. By reference to said act it will be seen that every alternate section within ten miles of each of said roads not otherwise disposed of by the United States was granted them, while an indemnity equivalent to the lands so disposed of was allowed within twenty miles of the road-lines named in the act.

Ten years from the passage of the act was given for the construction of said roads, in default of which the unsold lands were to revert to the United States. So far as the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad is concerned, unquestionably there has been a failure to comply with the provision of the law requiring construction in ten years from date of the passage of the act, and a large quantity of the lands granted remained unsold on the 3d day of March, 1573, said lands lying principally in ranges 21 and 22 east, comprising near thirty thousand [acres.] I learn from the local land office that said lands have not yet been restored to market, notwithstanding the failure to construct said last-mentioned road within the period fixed by said act. This being the case, I would most respectfully but earnestly ask, on behalf of a large number of my constituents, who, knowing the fact of forfeiture, have settled and made improvements upon a portion of said lands thus reverting to the United States, that they be restored to market to be disposed o

Hon. Columbus Delano, Servetary of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Speaker, the Attorney-General had previous to the writing of this letter decided in the Wisconsin case referred to that it was competent for the Secretary of the Interior to determine the question of failure of a railway company to comply with the requirements of a land grant made for its benefit, and that neither judicial nor congressional action was at all necessary to re-invest the Government with the absolute control and disposal of the granted lands. Upon the faith of that opinion I desired to have the Interior Department proclaim the forfeiture asked for in this bill, and to restore to market the lands to which the railroad company had no shadow of right and which had been withheld from market by executive order for more than ten years. But the Interior Department shields itself behind certain decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, reported 5, 9, and 21 Wallace, respectively, in each of which cases the principle claimed to be decided is that where a grant of land is made for any particular purpose and there has been a failure to comply with the provisions of the law making the grant, the United States Government must repossess itself of authority and control of the land before it can be opened up for settlement and entry, and that this can only be done by the action of the legislative branch of the Government.

Now, sir, this land was guaranteed to the State of Kansas for a certain purpose, that is, to aid in the construction of a railroad. The railroad company has failed to comply with the provisions of the law making the grant. The Supreme Court of the United States, under the decision which I have mentioned, would probably hold that the grant was in the State of Kansas unless the Congress of the United States should pass such a bill as that now reported by me from the Committee on Public Lands.

There is no question as to the forfeiture by the railroad company of all right to these lands. This bill embraces about twenty-nine or thirty thousand acres. Most of them are now occupied by actual settlers who are living thereon with their families, and who, knowing of the failure on the part of the railroad company, have felt secure in their possessions.

The provisions of this bill, after declaring the forfeiture, provides that these lands shall be opened up to settlement under the provisions of the homestead law only. I understand, from the temper of the House as manifested on two or three previous occasions when propositions were before it, that there is a disposition here to enact, propositions were before it, that there is a disposition here to enact, so far as practicable, that the public domain susceptible of agriculture shall in the future be subject to entry under the human provisions of the homestead law. Inasmuch as these lands have been taken, nearly all of them by actual settlers, it only seemed right to provide, as I have done by this bill, that they shall remain open for homestead entry by those already upon them. I go then another step in the right direction, as I believe, and secure to those who may hereafter settle the same right.

I will call the attention of members of the House to the fact that a short time since the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. Crounse] introduced a bill which came from my committee and was passed, providing for the sale of a certain military reservation in the State of Nebraska, and further that the lands embraced within the limits of that reservation should be open to entry and settlement under the provisions of the homestead law only. And that simply is what this law provides.

I do not know that this railroad company makes any objection to the passage of the bill. I think there is no claim on the part of anybody that there has been a compliance with the requirements of the grant in the construction of the road.

grant in the construction of the road.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. GOODIN. I will for a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Kansas this question, whether he does not think the public interests require, in view of the vast number of grants made within the last fifteen years upon certain conditions which have not been complied with, that there should be some general law providing for the return to the public domain of the lands so granted? Should there not be a general provision enacted for the forfeiture of all grants the conditions of which have not been complied with, so as to return those lands to the public domain and subject them to the homestead law? Does he not think such a general law desirable?

Mr. GOODIN. I will answer the gentleman from Indiana very frankly that I do. Mr. HOLMAN.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I trust the Committee on Public Lands, of which he is a member, will bring to the House a bill which will accomplish that purpose, and especially in view of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States and the opinions expressed under that decision by the Department of the Interior.

Mr. GOODIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, as I took occasion to observe in the discussion of another bill in this House, I think there is a disposition on the part of the Committee on the Public Lands to carry out the view just expressed by the gentleman from Indiana. We have several bills pending before that committee in reference to the publie lands, and so far as we can are endeavoring to incorporate the provisions into one general bill. The gentleman, however, will understand that grants to railroad companies are not all uniform in their character. There is, of course, a general similitude, but at the same time one contains provisions which are not to be found in others. While I agree, therefore, with the gentleman from Indiana that some such general law as he suggests may be adopted very properly, I hope he does not mean to throw out the suggestion at this time with any desire to impede the passage of the pending bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not at all, for I am in favor of any measure looking in that direction. I wish to see, of course, the same principle applied to the whole body of the public lands under grants actually forfeited by non-compliance with the conditions upon which the grants were made.

Mr. GOODIN. So do I, and I will cheerfully support such a measure when it is brought into shape and will also give cheerful assistance in shaping it.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I desire to know from the gentleman from Kansas whether or not this road is still in process of construction and whether or not the State of Kansas or this railroad company has asked for an extension of time for the completion of

Mr. GOODIN. In answer to the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania I will state that I know of no effort having ever been made, either by the State of Kansas or by this railroad company, to secure any such extension of time. As remarked by me in the beginning, the time for the construction of this road has expired under the act of March 3, 1873, and I now hold in my hand a letter from the Acting Commissioner of the General Land Office under date of Febru-ary 21, 1876, which I will read:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 21, 1876.

SIR: Referring to your personal request of Saturday, I have the honor to state that no evidence has been filed in this office of the construction of that portion of the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railread required by act of March 3, 1803, between Leavenworth and Lawrence, in the State of Kansas.

Very respectfully,

J. K. LIPPINCOTT, Acting Commissioner.

Hon. John R. Goodin, House of Representatives.

So it seems, Mr. Speaker, that, although three years have passed since the time when this road should have been finished, it is yet uncompleted between Leavenworth and Lawrence.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, I have detained the House about as long as I desire in endeavoring to get before it a true understanding of the purposes of this bill. I cannot, however, close without saying that in my judgment the legislation of the country in the future should be my judgment the legislation of the country in the future should be such as will advance the interests of the people who pioneer civilization and with true hearts and willing hands settle up the waste and desert places of this great nation and clothe them in beauty with the efforts of honest husbandry. Agriculture, which is the basis of real American nobility, should receive more care, and monopolies less, at the hands of our National Legislature. The policy from this time onward should be to mitigate as well as can be done the untold mischiefs and miseries which have been entailed upon the people by this pernicious land-grant system. The lands of the public domain admitting of settlement and cultivation should be henceforth reserved for those who are willing to occupy them; and the Government for those who are willing to occupy them; and the Government should not look to the sale of our agricultural lands for the purposes of revenue, but generously await their development by those who, in of revenue, but generously await their development by those who, in the over-crowded cities of our own country and of all Europe, too poor to purchase, but who in their determined willingness to work and in the strong arms given them, possess the primary elements of wealth which, when brought in contact with the broad acres of this mighty empire, untouched by the civilizing hand of the laborer, will cause them to yield up their treasures and contribute their due proportion in carrying on the affairs of the Government.

Mr. Speaker, I have said enough; and, unless some gentleman may have other inquiries concerning this bill, I demand the previous question.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I desire to make a remark if the gentleman who has reported this bill will allow me.

Mr. GOODIN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. In regard to the remark of the gentleman, as to a general law, I desire to say that every railroad grant stands on its own peculiar circumstances, and Congress has had occasion in various instances to extend the time because of peculiar circumstances and because of difficulties under which the road labored. A general law, therefore, making a forfeiture immediately upon the a general law, therefore, making a forfeiture immediately upon the expiration of the time would operate occasionally, and in some instances very harshly, perhaps unjustly, and I trust the committee will not report any bill having that object in view.

Mr. GOODIN. If there be no further inquiries to be made in reference to the provisions of this bill, I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered;

and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read

the third time, and passed.

SWAMP AND OVERFLOWED LANDS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. GAUSE, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 236) to give the consent of the United States to the appropriation of certain proceeds arising from the sale of the swamp and overflowed lands in Alabama for the purpose of furnishing other and additional accommodations for the indigent, insane, and idiotic persons resident in said State

The bill was read. It gives consent on the part of the United States to the appropriation of the proceeds arising from the sale of the swamp and overflowed lands in Alabama for the purposes and in the manner provided in the act of the General Assembly of the State of Alabama entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds from the sale of the swamp lands granted by Congress to Alabama for the purpose of furnishing additional accommodations for the indigent purpose of furnishing additional accommodations for the indigent insane and idiotic persons, residents of the State of Alabama," approved January 30, 1875.

Mr. GAUSE. In 1850, Congress granted to Arkansas, Alabama, and other States certain swamp and overflowed lands, the proceeds of the sale of which were to be applied exclusively to the reclamation of those swamp and overflowed lands. In Alabama the amount of proceeds arising from these sales is so small that the Legislature of that State considered it impracticable to apply them to any useful purpose. They therefore passed an act diverting this small fund from pose. They therefore passed an act diverting this small fund from the reclamation of the lands to the support of an asylum for the in-digent idiotic and insane of that State. I ask that the act of the Legislature be read in this connection for the information of the

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire to ask the gentleman reporting this bill how many acres of land are there that will be diverted from the purposes for which they were originally granted?

Mr. GAUSE. I do not know exactly the number of acres; but I am informed that the proceeds of the lands already sold amount to

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Is there any large quantity remaining unsold?

Mr. GAUSE. No, sir. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read

the third time, and passed.

Mr. GAUSE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was assed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SCHOOL LANDS.

Mr. HATHORN, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 280) to amend the act entitled "An act to appropriate lands for the support of schools in certain townships and fractional townships not before provided for," approved May 20, 1826.

The bill was read. It provides that in all cases where section 16 has been reserved for the support of schools in such township, and said sixteenth section, or any part thereof, has not been set apart or accrued to the said township, on account of paramount title, legal appropriation to any person, or use other than the support of schools, or from any other cause whatever, it shall be the duty of the Secreor from any other cause whatever, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior, on the application of the proper and legal school officers of said township, or of any agent so authorized by the laws of the State of Missouri, to select the tracts of land to which each of said townships may be entitled by virtue of the act and the act to which it is amendatory, out of any unappropriated land within the State in which the township for which any tract or tracts of land is selected may be situated, and when selected, shall be held by the same tenure, and upon the same terms, for the support of schools, in such township as section 16 is, or may be held in the State where such township shall

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. HATHORN] whether that is not the law already?
Mr. HATHORN. It is not the law in the State of Missouri.

Mr. HATHORN. It is not the law in the state of Missouri.
Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Is there not a general law that embraces what is provided in this bill?
Mr. HATHORN. Not that I am aware of.
It appears that in 1826 a law was passed donating to the State of Missouri for school purposes certain tracts of land, but some of those tracts, consisting of section 16, were in some of the townships deeded and disposed of before that law was passed. Now it is asked in behalf of the school officers that they may take the same amount of land out of any unappropriated land within the State. If the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Buckner] who introduced this bill desires to make any further remarks upon it, I will yield to him for

Mr. BUCKNER. I did not very distinctly hear the reading of the bill as reported from the committee, and I would like to know, where the grant of the sixteenth section has failed by virtue of paramount title, whether the selection is to be confined to that township? Is there any amendment of the bill in that respect?

Mr. HATHORN. There is not. Where the land has been all sold in the particular township, they may select from other parts of the State.

Mr. BUCKNER. Is there any amendment to the original bill?

Mr. HATHORN. There is not. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BUCKNER. I would like to hear the bill again reported.

The bill was again read.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I wish to inquire of the gentleman who reports the bill whether its operation is confined to the State of Missouri?

Mr. HATHORN. It is.

The bill was passed.

Mr. HATHORN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF TIME TO PRE-EMPTORS.

Mr. McDILL, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1001) to extend the time to pre-emptors on the public lands in certain counties in the State of Minnesota and the bill (H. R. No. 2115) to extend the time for making final proof and payment by pre-emptors in the Territory of Dakota one year, with a substitute (H. R. No. 2452) to extend the time to pre-emptors on the public lands; which was read a first and second time.

The substitute extends the time at which pre-emptors on the public lands and Indian reservations are now required to make final proof and payment for the period of two years whenever the crops on said pre-empted lands have been destroyed by grasshoppers within the last

Mr. McDILL. By the legislation of the last Congress relief was granted to pre-emptors who had suffered from the ravages of grasshoppers by extending the time for making proof for one year. Two bills for which we have reported a substitute were brought into the House, one by the Delegate from Dakota extending the time for two years in the Territory of Dakota, and the other by a gentleman from Minnesota extending the time for two years to pre-emptors on the public lands in Minnesota. The committee have thought that relief should be extended to all pre-emptors who have suffered from the ravages of grasshoppers. The reason why the time is extended for ravages of grassnoppers. The reason why the time is extended for two years exists in the fact that the misfortune which comes to these settlers extends for the whole term of two years. They lose the year in which the grasshoppers come and destroy their crops and the whole of the succeeding year. The effect of this law is to extend the time two years, and it seems to me to be a bill eminently just and proper. If no gentleman desires to ask any question, I will move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read

the third time, and passed.

Mr. McDILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

The latter motion was agreed to.

LANDS IN IOWA.

Mr. McDILL, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1752) to restore certain lands in the State of Iowa to market, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, and is as follows:

The bill was read, and is as follows:

Beit enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to restore to market, by published notice, all vacant unappropriated lands heretofore withdrawn for the Mississippi and Missouri Railroad, in the State of Iowa, situated more than twenty miles from the amended line of route as located under the act approved June 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act making a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State," approved May 15, 1856: Provided, That the price of said lands shall not be less than $2.50 per acre: And provided further, That all actual settlers now residing upon said lands shall be permitted to enter not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres for each head of a family or single man over twenty-one years of age, embracing improvements, in preference to any other person, on making proof of such settlement and paying for the lands in accordance with rules to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 2. That this act shall not include any lands embraced in the confirmatory act approved January 31, 1873, entitled "An act to quiet title to certain lands in the State of Iowa."

Mr. McDILL. The history of the legislation upon this subject is Mr. McDILL. The history of the legislation upon this subject is this: In the year 1856 certain lands were granted for railroad purposes to the State of Iowa, and the road was allowed to make a selection within fifteen miles of their line indefinitely located. The railroad company known as the Mississippi and Missouri River Railroad Company, following the language of the act, made its selection in accordance therewith, but later the Chicago and Rock Island Railroad, which became the successor of the Mississippi and Missouri River Railroad, changed its route so that it passed through the city of Des Moines now the capital of the State and considerably south of the Moines, now the capital of the State and considerably south of the first definitely located line, thereby uncovering the northern portion of the original selection. The Land Office holds that these lands must be restored to market before they can be severally entered. The sole object of this bill is simply to restore to market the uncovered and unappropriated lands lying north of the present extreme limits of the railroad grant. As gentlemen will observe, the bill protects settlers now on the lands so as to allow them to enter one hundred and sixty acres of land for each head of a family and each single man in preference of other persons.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would ask the gentleman who has charge of this bill the reason as to the price of the lands thus restored to mar-this bill the reason as to the price of the lands thus restored to market being kept at $2.50 per acre?

Mr. McDILL. The reason is that the original land-grant bill made a reservation that the lands reserved to the Government should be sold for not less than $2.50 per acre.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. Are all these lands occupied by set-

Are they all taken up?

Mr. McDILL. I am not able to answer that question with certainty; my impression is that the larger portion of these lands are occupied by settlers.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. Will the gentleman accept an amendment providing that all the lands not already taken up by settlers shall be confined to homestead settlements?

Mr. McDILL. I have no objection, as a member of the Committee on Public Lands, to that amendment being offered; I am quite willing to accept it.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot accept it; his bill is a report from a committee.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. Then I offer this amendment: that all the portions of these lands not occupied by settlers be reserved for homestead settlers.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield for that amendment !

Mr. McDILL. I do yield.
Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. I move, then, to amend in line 4, by striking out the word "market" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "to settlement under the homestead laws."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McDILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. The title would not seem to harmonize with the bill now; it is not now a bill to restore to market, but to restore to the provisions of the homestead law. I call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to that fact.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill as it stands will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to restore certain lands in the State of Iowa to market, and for other pur-

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the word "market" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "settlement under the homestead laws."

Mr. McDILL. I think the amendment adopted on motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Phillips] makes necessary still another amendment to the bill. His amendment has the effect of opening all this land to homestead entry; another portion of the bill provides that the price of this land shall not be less than $2.50 an acre. There should be an amendment striking out that provision of the bill.

Mr. SAYLER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was bassed, in order to move the amendment indicated by the gentleman passed, in order to move the amendment indicated by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. McDill.]

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider has already been submitted and laid upon the table.

Mr. McDill. I ask unanimous consent to strike out the portion of the bill to which I have referred.

The SPEAKER. The bill has already been passed, and is beyond the power of amendment.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.
Mr. WOOD, of New York. I then move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of taking up and proceeding with the consideration of the special order.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. Say-

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the special order, which is House bill No. 612, to carry into effect a convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, signed on the 30th day of January, 1875.

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That whenever the President of the United States shall receive satisfactory evidence that the legislature of the Hawaiian Islands have passed laws on their part to give full effect to the provisions of the convention between the United States and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, signed on the 30th day of January, 1875, he is hereby authorized to issue his proclamation declaring that he has such evidence; and thereupon, from the date of such proclamation, the following articles, being the growth and manufacture or produce of the Hawaiian Islands, to wit, arrow-root; castor-oil; bananas; nuts; vegetables, dried and undried, preserved and unpreserved; hides and skins, undressed; rice; pulu; seeds, plants, shrubs, or trees; muscovado, brown, and all other unrefined sugar, meaning hereby the grades of sugar heretofore commonly imported from the Hawaiian Islands, and now known in the markets of San Francisco and Portland as "Sandwich Island sugar;" sirups of sugar-cane, melado, and molasses; tallow, shall be introduced into the United States free of duty so long as the said convention shall remain in force.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I ask that the report of the majority of the committee reporting this bill be now read.

Mr. STEVENSON. I suggest that the minority report be read also. I think both reports should be read before the argument upon the bill is proceeded with.

The Clerk began the reading of the report of the majority, but before he had a realized.

before he had concluded,

Mr. THROCKMORTON said: I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of this report be dispensed with, and that both the majority and minority reports be printed in full in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The reports are as follow:

The Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 612) to carry into effect a convention between the United States and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, signed on the 30th day of January, 1875, report:

That the convention provides for a treaty between the United States and the Hawaiian Islands. It is strictly a commercial treaty so far as the government of the Hawaiian Islands is concerned, but contains provisions favorable to the United States of a commercial and political character which are not accorded to that government.

The convention, as agreed upon by the President and the Senate on the part of this Government and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, is as follows: CONVENTION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS—COMMERCIAL RECIPROCITY.

Concluded January 30, 1875; ratification advised by Senate March 18, 1875; ratified by President May 31, 1875; ratified by King April 17, 1875; ratifications exchanged at Washington, June 3, 1875; proclaimed June 3, 1875.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A Proclamation.

A Proclamation.

Whereas a convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, on the subject of commercial reciprocity, was concluded and signed by their respective plenipotentiaries, at the city of Washington, on the 30th day of January, 1875, which convention, as amended by the contracting parties, is word for word as follows:

The United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, equally animated by the desire to strengthen and perpetuate the friendly relations which have heretofore uniformly existed between them, and to consolidate their commercial intercourse, have resolved to enter into a convention for commercial reciprocity. For this purpose, the President of the United States has conferred full powers on Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State, and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands has conferred like powers on Hon. Elisha H. Allen, chief justice of the supreme court, chancellor of the kingdom, member of the privy council of state, His Majesty's envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the United States of America, and Hon. Henry A. P. Carter, member of the privy council of state, His Majesty's special commissioner to the United States of America.

And the said plenipotentiaries, after having exchanged their full powers, which were found to be in due form, have agreed to the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

For and in consideration of the rights and privileges granted by His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands in the next succeeding article of this convention, and as an equivalent therefor, the United States of America hereby agree to admit all the articles named in the following schedule, the same being the growth and manufacture or produce of the Hawaiian Islands, into all the ports of the United States free of duty.

SCHEDULE.

Arrow-root; castor-oil; bananas, nnts, vegetables, dried and undried, preserved and unpreserved; hides and skins undressed; rice; pulu; seeds, plants, shrubs, or trees; muscovado, brown, and all other unrefined sugar, meaning hereby the grades of sugar heretofore commonly imported from the Hawaiian Islands and now known in the markets of San Francisco and Portland as "Sandwich Island sugar;" sirups of sugar-cane, melado, and molasses; tallow.

ARTICLE II.

For and in consideration of the rights and privileges granted by the United States of America in the preceding article of this convention, and as an equivalent therefor, His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands hereby agrees to admit all the articles named in the following schedule, the same being the growth, manufacture, or produce of the United States of America, into all the ports of the Hawaiian Islands free of duty.

SCHEDULE.

Agricultural implements; animals; beef, bacon, pork, ham, and all fresh, smoked, or preserved meats; boots and shoes; grain, flour, meal, and bran, bread and breadstuffs, of all kinds; bricks, lime, and cement; butter, cheese, lard, tallow; bullion; coal; cordage, naval stores, including tar, pitch, resin, turpentine raw and rectified; copper and composition sheathing; nails and bolts; cotton and manufactures of cotton, bleached and unbleached, and whether or not colored, stained, painted, or printed; eggs, fish and oysters, and all other creatures living in the water, and the products thereof; fruits, nuts, and vegetables, green, dried or undried, preserved or unpreserved; hardware; hides, furs, skins and pelts, dressed or undressed; hoop-iron, and rivets, nails, spikes and bolts, tacks, brads or sprigs; ice; iron and steel and manufactures thereof; leather; lumber, and timber of all kinds, round, hewed, sawed, and unmannfactured in whole or in part; doors, sashes, and blinds; machinery of all kinds, engines and parts thereof; oats and hay; paper; stationery, and books, and all manufactures of paper or of paper and wood; petroleum and all oils for lubricating or illuminating purposes; plants, shrubs, trees, and seeds; rice; sugar, refined or unrefined; salt; soap; shooks, staves, and headings; wool and manufactures of wool, other than ready-made clothing; wagons and carts for the purposes of agriculture or of drayage; wood and manufactures of wood, or of wood and metal except furniture either upholstered or carved and carriages; textile manufactures, made of a combination of wool, eotton, silk, or linen, or of any two or more of them other than when ready-made clothing; harness and all manufactures of leather; starch; and tobacco, whether in leaf or manufactured.

ARTICLE III.

The evidence that articles proposed to be admitted into the ports of the United States of America, or the ports of the Hawaiian Islands, free of duty, under the first and second articles of this convention, are the growth, manufacture, or produce of the United States of America or of the Hawaiian Islands, respectively, shall be established under such rules and regulations and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the two Governments may from time to time respectively prescribe.

ARTICLE IV.

ARTICLE IV.

No export duty or charges shall be imposed in the Hawaiian Islands, or in the United States, upon any of the articles proposed to be admitted into the ports of the United States or the ports of the Hawaiian Islands free of duty under the first and second articles of this convention. It is agreed, on the part of His Hawaiian Majesty, that so long as this treaty shall remain in force, he will not lease or otherwise dispose of or create any lien upon any port, harbor, or other territory in his dominions, or grant any special privilege or rights of use therein, to any other power, State, or government, nor make any treaty by which any other nation shall obtain the same privileges, relative to the admission of any articles free of duty, hereby secured to the United States.

Article V.

ARTICLE V.

The present convention shall take effect as soon as it shall have been approved and proclaimed by His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, and shall have been ratified and duly proclaimed on the part of the Government of the United States, but not until a law to carry it into operation shall have been passed by the Congress of the United States of America. Such assent having been given, and the ratifications of the convention having been exchanged as provided in article 6, the convention shall remain in force for seven years from the date at which it may come into operation; and further, until the expiration of twelve months after either of the high contracting parties shall give notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same; each of the high contracting parties being at liberty to give such notice to the other at the end of the said term of seven years, or at any time there-

ARTICLE VI.

The present convention shall be duly ratified and the ratifications exchanged at Washington City within eighteen months from the date hereof or earlier if possible. In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries of the high contracting parties have signed this present convention and have affixed thereto their respective seals. Done in duplicate, at Washington, the 30th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1875.

Lord 1875 SEAL.

Secretary of State.

Hamilton Fish,
Secretary of State.

The treaty, in consequence of its abolition of the duty now imposed by law in the United States on the articles enumerated in the schedule, requires an ect of Congress to carry it into effect. Unlike most of the treaties made with foreign nations, not only the consent of the House of Representatives is required to give it validity, but the proposition to do so must begin there.

In the papers marked confidential, submitted by the President to the Senate for its consideration, with a view to the ratification of this treaty, is a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to the Secretary of State, relating to the commerce between the United States and the Hawaiian Islands.

With this letter are tables, furnished by the Bureau of Statistics, showing the imports into the United States from the Hawaiian Islands during the fiscal years ending June 30, 1871 to 1874; also statement of domestic exports from the United States to those islands for the same periods. From these tables it appears the total imports fint the United States from the Hawaiian Islands was, for 1871, $1,133,154; for 1872, $1,285,320; for 1873, $1,316,270; and for 1874, $1,017,172; while the exports to those islands were, in 1871, $403,85; in 1872; $620,295; in 1873, $654,103; and in 1874, $622,280.

In addition to these tables, we have procured and add the importations and exportations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, which state the importations at $1,227,191 and the exportations $695,384.

Thus is presented a comparative statement of the trade of the two countries for the past five years, which shows a balance in favor of the Hawaiian Islands.

This trade is chiefly in tropical or semi-tropical products, as imported, and in miscellaneous products of the United States, as exported.

It will be seen that, so far as the aggregate value in the amount of the commerce between the two countries is concerned, it is not of great importance. It is, however, an interesting fact, those islands buy from u

"The conditions attending this commerce appear to be such as render it of greater value to the United States, in proportion to its volume, than is usual with corntries similarly situated and producing sugar as the leading staple. So far as the exchange of articles is concerned, there is an equivalent to be found in our export trade for the value of the sugar and the other articles imported. Such is not the case with most of the tropical islands or sugar-producing countries of either hemisphere.

case with most of the tropical islands or sugar-producing countries of center nemesphere.

"The import trade from the several possessions of the East Indies shows large aggregates received and very small values returned in the produce of the United States. The heavy adverse balance must be paid in coin. Thus the exports of United States produce and manufactures to China are but 5 per cent of the imports from China, and the light exports to the British East Indies are but 1 per cent. of the imports therefrom.

"The exports to the Spanish East Indies, or Manila, are but one-third of 1 per cent. of the imports from those possessions; and, finally, the exports to the Dutch East Indies are but 4 per cent. of the imports from the same.

"The Hawaiian Islands take an aggregate value of American produce and manufactures twice as great as do the last three countries or possessions taken together."

The following statement is in further illustration, by figures, of this point:

The importation of rice from the Hawaiian Islands for the fiscal year ending June, 1875, was 794 tons, valued at $60,131, which is a small portion of what the Pacific States consume.

This reciprocal trade is better than free trade, for, while it increases the trade of the contracting parties and concentrates it in their hands, it is a restraint on the trade of other countries, because they have duties and other charges to pay from which the parties to this reciprocal treaty are free.

With reference to the ostensible trade between the Hawaiian Islands and the United States, as shown by the values reported, it may be said that these values do not probably accurately state it, as, for instance, there are reasons for believing they are too largely stated for imports and as much in deficiency for exports. The official statements of the Hawaiian government of imports from the United States for 1873 are placed at $336,522, of which sum $766,522 in value paid duty, and the exports to the United States are stated at $1,088,2*6; whereas, according to our valuations, our exports for the same period were $1,316,270, and the imports $697,191, showing a material difference.

The Secretary of the Treasury further states that—

"The effect on the revenue of admitting the articles named in the schedule free of duty is first to remit the amount levied on sugar, the quantity of which was in 1873 (fiscal year) 15,743,146 pounds, on which the duty, at two cents per pound, is $314,863, and, inclusive of a small amount of other saccharine products, (molasses and melado,) it amounts to $320,345 in all on this class of articles. This is also nearly the average for three years ending with 1873.

"The duty on other articles imported and included in the schedule of articles to be admitted free is small in amount, including none of conspicuous importance. The aggregate received is less than $50,000 per year. The entire release of duty proposed by the treaty, therefore, would be nearly $370,000 yearly.

"In relation to the question of duty, it is, however, only just to say that the present consumption of sugar on the Pacific coast is rapidly increasing, the increase each year being mearly equal to the total importation of a year from these islands.

"For 1873 (the fiscal year) the total quantity of sugar imported at San Francisco islands.

"For 1873 (the fiscal year) the total quantity of sugar imported at San Francisco was 72,026,072 pounds and 2,980,939 pounds at Portland, Oregon, together 75,007.011 pounds. In the preceding year the entire quantity was 62,861,460 pounds, a difference of 12,145,545 pounds in 1873 over 1872.

"During 1874 the importation was still larger. This increasing importation and consumption therefore cause the question to stand not so much as one of diminution of present revenue, but rather as a check to their increase to the extent of the importation of sugar and other dutiable articles made free. The lack of natural facilities for developing the production of sugar in the islands embraced in the treaty would keep down the future proportions of this check."

The Secretary, in conclusion, further states:

The Secretary, in conclusion, in their states:

"The proposed release of this duty would undoubtedly increase this trade, and its increase would go far toward compensating for the loss resulting from the release of sugar from duty.

"Should the sugar-product so released increase to 25,000,000 pounds yearly, the export trade would probably equal it in value

"In addition to the particular articles of commerce affected by the treaty, there are general commercial advantages likely to follow, which can only be alluded to here. The rendezvous so long afforded at these islands for the sailing-fleets of the Pacific is still needed; and, with the increasing commerce of all the seas bordering the Pacific, the demand increases for such aids and facilities as would be afforded through the establishment of American interests in the Hawaiian Islands proposed by the treaty."

through the establishment of American interests in the Hawaiian Islands proposed by the treaty."

It will thus be seen that the Secretary of the Treasury does not attach importance to the loss of revenue growing out of the ratification of this treaty.

Agreeing with all of his predecessors who have been consulted on the subject, he approves of a treaty of this character with the Hawaiian Islands.

There is no doubt that, looked upon as simply a revenue measure, it would not seem as if there was immediate advantage to the United States; but, when we take into consideration not only the present but the prospective commerce of the Pacific, it cannot be disputed it is of much greater advantage to us than to the other party to the treaty.

This treaty authorizes an exchange of the products of the soil, such as sugar, rice, and some tropical fruits, for lumber, flour, and manufactures of the United States.

The Pacific States are to receive from those islands what they do not produce, and the islands are to receive from the Pacific States in exchange therefor what they do not produce.

As sugar is the principal article released, it may be well to consider it specially in this connection. Some fears have been expressed as to the effect of this release

As sugar is the principal article released, it may be well to consider it specially in this connection. Some fears have been expressed as to the effect of this release from duty on the like products of the United States.

It cannot be said that the admission of Hawaiian sugar will have the least influence upon the sugar-market in the Atlantic States, for it is impossible that this sugar can in any way come in competition with it. To show how little the Atlantic-grown sugar can be affected by the admission of the Pacific-grown sugar into the Pacific ports free, (for it is only in the Pacific ports that this sugar can ever be imported,) the following comparative statement is submitted:

The importation of sugar into the United States during 1873 was. 760,648 Imported from the islands 77, 404 or about one hundredth of the whole.

Whole importation into the United States 797, 153

a trifle over one hundredth of the whole, showing an increase of imports into the United States of 50,757 tons.

Imports of sugar from all countries into the Pacific States in fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, was 66 446,470 pounds, while the importation from the islands to the Pacific States was 17,888,000 pounds, a trifle over one-quarter of the whole importation, so that it will be seen that the whole importation from the islands cannot affect the market in the Atlantic States. It is not possible that the Hawaiian sugar can ever find its way to the Atlantic States—the cost of transportation would exclude it; nor can there be fear of any very great increase in the production of this sugar, in view of the steadily diminishing population of the islands. (See Appendix A.)

As pertinent to the consideration of this question, we should not lose sight of a probable diversion of the trade of the islands to another direction; already a very large proportion of it has been attracted to the British colonies in the Pacific. In 1873 the total export of sugar from the Hawaiian Islands was 11,595 tons, of which 4,191 tons were sent to British colonies, and of the imports of the same year more than one-half was from other countries than the United States.

At the present time a great number of British, American, and Hawaiian vessels annually enter Australian and New Zealand ports with sugar cargoes. The greater part of these enter at New Castle or Sydney, thence take coal freights back to the islands. New Zealand, Tasmania, and Victoria are striving for a monopoly of the trade, and have recently made considerable progress.

The supply of sugar in the Mauritius is rapidly defining, and a substitute for it is found in that of the Hawaiian Islands, and the effort now is to procure a monopoly of it.

The English governmentand peeple are always on the alert to increase their commercial advantages. Their vast Pacific possessions, already of incalculable value, require a larger supply of sugar for consumption than can now be supplied, hence their interest in procuring a monopoly of this trade.

It is not, therefore, unreasonable to apprehend that the United States may lose a considerable portion of this trade unless better commercial relations are made with the islands.

The producing interest of the islands has been for years in a depressed state, but it is thought that the treaty will give an impulse to the business, and although it reduces their revenues from customs, and imposes upon them direct taxes, they prefer to try this rather than to seek relations with any other country.

It has been said that the United States will surely have this trade if they do nothing to encourage it.

This is an entire mistake, for production must diminish and the trade lessen by the impoverished condition of the people, or they will be compelled to make commercial relations with some other country.

There is now communication by steamers from San Francisco to Australia, touching at the islands, besides vessels calling at the islands for freight, and frequently freighted with coal, which affords reasonable freight for return cargo.

In this day of sharp contest for the trade of the Pacific, some effort must be made to secure it. These steamers are subsidized by the governments of Australia and New Zealand, and it is a liberal effort to secure the trade of the Pacific.

The United States derives advantages from the treaty superior to the islands in some respects.

The United States derives advantages from the treaty superior to the islands in some respects.

If the exports and imports are equal, as they probably will be, it would be an equal bargain. But as the islands have no vessels, the United States will have the carrying trade, and the supplying them with all the variety of their produce and manufactures.

But supposing that there were no reciprocity of commerce in this treaty, that the commercial advantages were largely against us, and that we were to lose even $400,000 annual revenue, yet there are political reasons of sufficient magnitude to warrant us to make it. We should consider it as a question comprehending interests beyond the mere free exchange of the articles enumerated in the schedules.

It involves matters of higher interests, of graver importance, and greater significance than those which relate simply to reciprocal advantages likely to result from a free exchange of commodities.

It involves matters or higher interests, or graver importance, and greater significance than those which relate simply to reciprocal advantages likely to result from a free exchange of commodities.

Private interests should be subordinate to national interests and commercial security and advancement.

The geographical position of the Hawaiian Islands, their relation to our Pacific coast and to the countries adjacent to the Pacific Ocean, their history, area, and capabilities of production, the character of their harbors and their commerce, the present and future commerce of the ocean which surrounds them, the problem as to their future political status, together with the certainty that they cannot maintain autonomy or hold their place as a separate nation and not become absorbed by some other power, are to be considered in determining the question as to the policy of making this treaty. As early as 1840 the importance of these islands, in their geographical and political aspect, attracted the attention of our Government.

Mr. Webster, when Secretary of State, even before the acquisition of California, declared that the Government of the United States would look with displeasure upon any effort by any other government to acquire any prependerating influence over the government of the Hawaiian Islands; and he further said, in relation to an intimation that the French would probably take possession of the islands, that "he trusted they would not take possession, but if they did, they would be dislotged, if it took the whole power of this Government to do it, if his advice were taken."

Subsequently, in view of the importance of more intimate commercial relations with this country. Mr. Marcy, while Secretary of State, negotiated a treaty similar in principle, and he left on record his opin ion that he regarded it as "a measure of great importance to both countries;" but, from considerations peculiar to that day, it was not reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to the Senate.

The question, however, was regarded by the Government of so much importance that Mr. Seward, when Secretary of State, stated to the Hawaiian minister that he designed to negotiate another treaty, and would do so when the war was closed; adding that the Government made no treaties at that time without some especial provisions, which, perhaps, would not be well to incorporate in such a treaty. But during his term of office such a treaty was made. But it had the misfortune to be before the Senate at the time of the San Domingo treaty, and it suffered from that association.

during his term of office such a treaty was made. But it had the misfortune to be before the Senate at the time of the San Domingo treaty, and it suffered from that association.

This treaty, incorporating the same principle of reciprocal trade, has many advantages which the other treaties had not. It embraces almost the whole import trade of the islands on the free list, to the exclusion of Great Britain and Germany and all other countries, so far as the discrimination of duties is against them. It contains the additional provisions that no export duty or charges shall be imposed in the Hawaiian Islands or in the United States upon any of the articles proposed to be admitted into the ports of the United States or the ports of the Hawaiian Islands free of duty under the first and second articles of this convention. It is agreed on the part of His Hawaiian Majesty that, so long as this treaty shall remain in force, he will not lease or otherwise dispose of or create any lien upon any port, harbor, or other territory in his dominions or grant any special privilege or rights of use therein to any other power, state, or government, nor make any treaty by which any other nation shall obtain the same privileges relative to the admission of any articles free of duty hereby secured to the United States.

The treaty, after the most thorough discussion in the Senate, was ratified by a vote of 51 to 12. It will be seen, therefore, that the principles of the treaty have been approved by many of the leading statesmen of the country and by almost every administration of the Government for many years, and there has been an entire unanimity of opinion that the United States must have such commercial relations with them as will prevent them from being allied to any other country.

The misfortune of the islands is that they have no home market, and they are entirely dependent upon the trade of other countrys, and hence the necessity of commercial relations with this or some other country.

The Legislature of Oregon expressed the

Aft. Seward, in a speech he made in the Senate of the subject of the commerce of the Pacific, said:

"Who does not see that henceforth every year European commerce, European politics. European thought, and European activity, although actually gaining greater force, and European connections, although actually becoming more intimate, will ultimately sink, nevertheless, in importance, while the Pacific Ocean, its shores, its islands, and the vast region beyond, will become the chief theater of events in the world's great hereafter?"

The commercial prosperity of the Pacific States, sustained not only by its immense productive power, by agriculture and mining, but by its central position, must rapidly increase by its means of easy communication with China and Japan, and the British colonies in the South Pacific, and with the Atlantic States and Europe. And when the other railroads across the continent to the Pacific, and the ship-canal connecting the Atlantic and Pacific are complete, it will add, of course, immensely to the navigation and commerce of that ocean. The Sandwich Islands are in the track of this great commerce; and whatever maritime power moors her fleet there holds the key to the North Pacific, for, as Jarvis, the historian of the islands, says:

"No trade could prosper, or even exist, while a hostile power, possessing an active and powerful marine, should send forth its cruisers to prey on commerce."

He says further, that—

"A military colony once fairly established on them might put at defiance any means of attack which could be brought to bear against them."

Since the time that Jarvis wrote, California has been acquired, in which has been built one of the great commercial cities of the Union; and this city is connected by a railroad with the Atlantic and by steamers with Japan and China, with the Hawaiian Islands, Fiji Islands, Australia, and New Zealand, and the coast of America to Chili. Other railroads across the continent are being built, which will make additional connections with ports and islands on the Pacific. The day will doubtless come when a ship-canal will be built connecting the Atlantic and the Pacific, and, of course, extending commerce and civil relations with the rich countries of the East.

The London Times thus refers to the chief harbor of the islands:

"The narrow land-locked inlet or lagoon named Pearl River Harbor is in itself small in absolute extent, but it is of inestimable value to any civilized nation possessing it and using it for naval purposes. In the deep waters of this sheltered lake not only the armed ships of the United States, but of all countries, may find space and perfect security. The maritime power which holds Pearl River Harbor and monors her fleet there, holds also the key of the North Pacific."

Oregon has added her valuable agricultural products, with lumber and manufactures, to the great stock of the States, all of which, when the resources of the Pacific are even partially developed, will stimulate commerce by their rich abundance.

tures, to the great stock of the States, all of which, when the resources of the Pacific are even partially developed, will stimulate commerce by their rich abundance.

The Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco made a report in favor, some years ago, in which this language is used:

"Opposite the very portals of this commerce, and directly in its track, lie these islands, keeping, as it were, watch and ward over us and over this entire coast and its commerce. Plant an active enemy on them, and let him fortify himself there, if he were the smallest of the maritime powers, he would probably annihilate this commerce. A power with a fleet consisting of only the Florida and the Alabama would, intrenched in these marine fortresses, harass all profit out of it. In the hands of France or England the effect would be to enable either of those powers to shut us out of the great highway of the Pacific and lock us up, so far as commerce is concerned, within our own mountain ranges, absolutely at its pleasure. The United States, by keeping up an enormous naval armament on this coast, could carry her flag with her floating batteries in defiance of such powers and their mid-ocean fortress; but sommerce vould be sup-mded; and so important has this commerce of the Pacific become to the United States, so great its present proportions, and so intimately blended with the nation's bopes and interests in its prospective growth, the very knowledge that a hostile power, so located, could at will destroy it almost without cost, would compel the United States, in all integrational intercourse, to take a humbler tone and be less independent in urging its own views, for nations like men intuitively bate their breath in the presence of a power which can, if disposed, inflict on them a grand injury with small effort."

Sir George Simpson, the former governor of the Hudson Bay Company, in his travels around the world, says that "the position of this archipelago is far more valuable on this account, that it neither is nor can ever be shared by British colonies in the South Pacific:

Besides the recently acquired possession of the Fiji Islands, containing some two hundred and twenty-five islands in number.

The population of these colonies is approaching 3,000,000, with great enterprise and wealth.

The Queen, in her speech to Parliament last February, said:

"The King and chiefs of Fiji having made a new offer of their islands, unfettered by conditions. I have thought it right to accept the cession of a territory which, independently of its large natural resources, offers important maritime advantages by my fleets in the Pacific."

In addition to these great pressessions in the South Pacific Court Parlia.

In addition to these great possessions in the South Pacific, Great Britain has British Columbia in the North Pacific, so that, should she now acquire the Saudwich Islands, she would have a perfect cordon around the Pacific States. These islands are the only interruption to the chief control.

The Hawaiian Islands can do but little in promoting their prosperity without more intimate relations with this or some other commercial country.

Their civilization is modeled after our own. They have similar systems of laws. Our principles of jurisprudence are controlling authority in their courts.

Their literary and religious institutions are similar to our own, and an American in visiting their capital would feel as if he were in an American town. It is an eventful period in the history of that part of the world, and it is important that our commercial relations should be made more intimate, so that should the day come when those islands are, as it were, a waif on the ocean, they would come naturally under our control, without money and without price, and, what is infinitely more important, without a conflict with any greatnation of the world. Other nations want them, but this country has the vantage-ground and the preference; for as a people, their affections are with us.

In view, therefore, of these considerations, the committee report in favor of the bill to carry this treaty into effect.

The slight loss of revenue is of small value as compared with the many higher and more important interests to be subserved.

The Pacific Ocean is an American ocean, destined to hold a far higher place in the future history of the world than the Atlantic. It is the future great highway between ourselves and the hundreds of millions of Asiatics who look to us for commerce, civilization, and Christianity. These islands rest midway between us and them as the necessary post provided by the Great Ruler of the universe as points of observation, rest, supply, military strategy, and command, to enable each other to unite in protecting both hemispheres from European assault, aggression, and avarice.

The undersigned, a minority of the Committee of Ways and Means, submit their views and objections to the bill (H. R. No. 612) to carry into effect the proposed treaty between the United States and the Hawaiian Islands, signed January 30, 1875. The proposed treaty is as follows:

CONVENTION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF THE HAWAHAN ISLANDS—COMMERCIAL RECIPROCITY.

Concluded January 30, 1875; ratification advised by Senate March 18, 1875; ratified by President May 31, 1875; ratified by King April 17, 1875; ratifications exchanged at Washington June 3, 1875; proclaimed June 3, 1875.

A Proclamation.

A Proclamation.

Whereas a convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, on the subject of commercial reciprocity, was concluded and signed by their respective plenipotentiaries, at the city of Washington, on the 30th day of January, 1875, which convention, as amended by the contracting parties, is word for word as follows:

The United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, equally animated by the desire to strengthen and perpetuate the friendly relations which have heretofore uniformly existed between them, and to consolidate their commercial intercourse, have resolved to enter into a convention for commercial reciprocity. For this purpose, the President of the United States has conferred full powers on Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State, and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands has conferred like powers on Hon. Elisha H. Allen, chief justice of the supreme court, chancellor of the kingdom, member of the privy council of state, His Majesty's envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the United States of America, and Hon. Henry A. P. Carter, member of the privy council of state, His Majesty's special commissioner to the United States of America. And the said plenipotentiaries, after having exchanged their full powers, which were found to be in due form, have agreed to the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

ARTICLE I.

ARTICLE I.

For and in consideration of the rights and privileges granted by His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands in the next succeeding article of this convention, and as an equivalent therefor, the United States of America hereby agree to admit all the articles named in the following schedule, the same being the growth and manufacture or produce of the Hawaiian Islands, into all the ports of the United States free of duty.

SCHEDULE.

Arrow-root; castor-oil; bananas, nuts, vegetables, dried and undried, preserved and unpreserved; hides and skins undressed; rice; pulu; seeds, plants, shrubs, or trees; muscovado, brown, and all other unrefined sugar, meaning hereby the grades of sugar heretofore commonly imported from the Hawaiian Islands and now known in the markets of San Francisco and Portland as "Sandwich Island sugar;" sirups of sugar-cane, melado, and molasses; tallow.

ARTICLE II.

For and in consideration of the rights and privileges granted by the United States of America in the preceding article of this convention, and as an equivalent therefor. His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands hereby agrees to admit all the articles named in the following schedule, the same being the growth, manufacture, or produce of the United States of America, into all the ports of the Hawaiian Islands free of duty.

SCHEDULE.

Agricultural implements; animals; beef, bacon, pork, ham, and all fresh, smoked, or preserved meats; boots and shoes; grain, flour, meal, and bran, bread and breadstuffs, of all kinds; bricks, lime, and cement; butter, cheese, lard, tallow; bullion; coal; cordage, naval stores; including far, pitch, resin, tarpentine, raw and rectified; copper and composition sheathing; nails and bolts; cotton and manufactures of cotton, bleached and unbleached, and whether or not colored, stained, painted, or printed; eggs, fish, and oysters, and all other creatures living in the water, and the products thereof; fruits, nuts, and vegetables, green, dried, or undried, preserved or unpreserved; hardware; hides, furs, skins, and pelts, dressed or undressed; hoopiron and rivets, nails, spikes, and bolts, tacks, brads, or sprigs; ice; iron and steel, and manufactures thereof; leather; lumber, and timber, of all kinds, round, hewed, sawed, and unmanufactured, in whole or in part; doors, sashes, and blinds; machinery of all kinds, engines, and parts thereof; oats and hay; paper, stationery, and books, and all manufactures of paper or of paper and wood; petroleum and all oils for lubricating or illuminating purposes; plants, shrubs, trees, and seed; rice; sugar, refined or unrefined; salt; soap; shooks, staves, and headings; wool and manufactures of wool, other than ready-made clothing; wagons and carts for the purposes of agriculture or of drayage; wood and manufactures of wood, or of wood and metal, except furniture, either upholstered or carved, and carriages; textile manufactures, made of a combination of wool, cotton, silk, or linen, or of any two or more of them other than when ready-made clothing; harness and all manufactures of leather; starch; and tobacco, whether in leaf or manufactured.

ARTICLE III.

ARTICLE III.

The evidence that articles proposed to be admitted into the ports of the United States of America or the ports of the Hawaiian Islands free of duty under the first and second articles of this convention are the growth, manufacture, or produce of the United States of America or of the Hawaiian Islands, respectively, shall be established under such rules and regulations and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the two Governments may from time to time respectively

ARTICLE IV.

ARTICLE IV.

No export duty or charges shall be imposed in the Hawaiian Islands or in the United States upon any of the articles proposed to be admitted into the ports of the United States or the ports of the Hawaiian Islands free of duty under the first and second articles of this convention. It is agreed, on the part of His Hawaiian Majesty, that so long as this treaty shall remain in force he will not lease or otherwise dispose of or create any lien upon any port, harbor, or other territory in his dominions, or grant any special privilege or rights of use therein, to any other power, state, or government, nor make any treaty by which any other nation shall obtain the same privileges, relative to the admission of any articles free of duty, hereby secured to the United States.

ARTICLE V.

ARTICLE V.

The present convention shall take effect as soon as it shall have been approved and proclaimed by His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, and shall have been ratified and duly proclaimed on the part of the Government of the United States, but not until a law to carry it into operation shall have been passed by the Congress of the United States of America. Such assent having been given, and the ratifications of the convention having been exchanged as provided in article VI, the convention shall remain in force for seven years from the date at which it may come into operation; and, further, until the expiration of twelve months after either of the high contracting parties shall give notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same; each of the high contracting parties being at liberty to give such notice to the other at the end of the said term of seven years, or at any time thereafter.

ARTICLE VI.

The present convention shall be duly ratified, and the ratifications exchanged at Washington City, within eighteen months from the date hereof, or earlier if possible. In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries of the high contracting parties have signed this present convention and have affixed thereto their respective seals. Done in duplicate at Washington, the 30th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1875.

And whereas the said convention, as amended, has been duly ratified on both parts, and the respective ratifications were exchanged in this city on this day:

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States of America, have caused the said convention to be made public, to the end that the same, and every clause and article thereof, may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

By the President: HAMILTON FISH, Secretary of State.

HAMILTON FISH,

Secretary of State.

A statement from the Secretary of the Treasury shows the imports into the United States from those islands for the last fiscal year to have been $1,227,191, from which the Government of the United States received in revenue from import duties the sum of $456,777.

From the same source it appears that the whole value of goods, wares, and merchandise exported from the United States, of her products to these islands, for the same year, was the sum of $655,174, not one-third in excess of the amount of annual revenue received, $456,777, from our commerce with the islands; which sum it is proposed by this treaty to give away and remit, chiefly to the sugar interest on the islands, and necessarily to be made up by further taxation upon our own people.

This is giving and remitting nearly one dollar of duty to the islands for the privilege of selling another dollar's worth of products.

The Secretary of the Treasury says further that in the six months of the current fiscal year, ending December 31, 1875, the importation of sugar into the United States from these islands amounted to 12,425,219 pounds. At this rate the imports of sugar in the year ending June 30, 1876, would reach 24,850,438 pounds, the duty on which is $43,633; and this from sugar alone.

So that, with this treaty in force this year, we would pay at least a dollar for the privilege of selling goods worth a like sum.

Of the commerce or trade with the Hawaiian Islands the sugar product is of chief value, the quantity sent to us being $933,676, out of a total import of $1,227,191, or more than three-fourths of the whole. The product of this article is rapidly increasing. It increased from 1,444,271 pounds in 1860 to 28,000,000 in 1875.

Under this treaty, by which this sugar is admitted free, and the producers thus given two and two-fifths cents per pound bounty over all other sugars of like quality imported, we shall receive the entire crop. This, with the producers of the bounty of two and two-fifths cents per pound.

would cost us a dollar for the privilege of selling goods of the value of another, and during the seven years' continuance of the treaty, should it be ratified, it will cost would cest us a collar for the prince of the treaty, should it be ratified, it will cost us at least $10,000,000.

Neither would this give us cheap sugar; the quantity imported is only 1 per cent. of our consumption, nor can it exceed (for natural causes, such as the limited quantity of arable lands) 5 or 6 per cent. of our consumption; and this cannot reduce tity of arable lands) 5 or 6 per cent. or our consumption; and this cannot reduce the prices in our market.

Thus it is that the forty or fifty sugar-planters (none of whom are Sandwich-Islanders) who control the sugar product on these islands will receive the highest market prices from our citizens, while our citizens will receive no benefit from it by reason of cheaper goods, nor will the Sandwich Islands receive any benefit therefore.

This benefit all inures to the sugar-planters, for the reason that this treaty artfully provides that the Sandwich Islands shall lay no export duty. The sugarplanters, therefore, get the two and two-fifths cents per pound bounty, which is remitted by us, and, as shown above, without a reduction of the market price.
The money so remitted from our Treasury goes not to the treasury of the Hawaiian Islands, but to the sugar-planters. On an examination of the imposing list of articles which we may import into the islands free of duty, it will be found to contain bricks, shrubs, trees, rice, sugar, wool, and very many articles with which the people of the islands supply themselves, or do not need, while liquors and spirits and ready-made clothing, which have made up about one-seventh of our exports to the islands, are carefully omitted. In short, the undersigned are of the opinion that this treaty is not justified by any principle of reciprocity, and cannot be sanctioned consistently with the interests, financial, commercial, or otherwise, of the United States. United States.

United States.

The undersigned further show that, by treaties already in existence with other sugar-growing countries, the same exemption from duties upon sugars grown in such countries will accrue to them as is allowed by this treaty to the Hawaiian Islands. Many of these countries have easy access to the Atlantic ports of the United States by water; and, in consequence, these foreign-grown sugars will, being duty free, enter into competition with the sugars grown in the United States, and be exempt from the burdens of internal taxation, to which our own citizens are subject.

United States by water; and, in consequence, these foreign-grown sugars will, being duty free, enter into competition with the sugars grown in the United States, and be exempt from the burdens of internal taxation, to which our own citizens are subject.

The total revenue for the year ending June 30, 1875, upon sugar and molasses imported into the United States, was about $38,000,000. The rate of duty reduced to ad valorem on molasses is about $20 per cent.; on sugars, ranging from $41$ to 65 per cent. This duty, hitherto so fruitful in revenue, and at the same time so beneficial to our own planters, is proposed to be abandoned, in part in favor of foreign planters, who will avoid the burdens which are imposed upon our own citizens.

Nor will it do to say that because the Hawakan sugars will not come into competition with our own in the Pacific markets that the treaty does our planters no injury. For the freedom from duty will accrue, as has been shown, to foreign sugars grown upon the Atlantic coast. And besides, the undersigned may state the further fact, that while the unrefined sugars of the growth of Louisiana may not be exported to our Pacific ports, refined sugars may be and are; and thus the preference to the sugar-refiner on the Pacific, who uses the sugar imported duty free under this treaty, over the sugar-refiners in the Atlantic cities, will react upon the planter athome, whose sugars the latter must use, or else use sugars imported, subject to a heavy duty.

The same course of reasoning applies to the article of rice, which is to be imported duty free under this treaty from the Hawaiian Islands.

The undersigned are thus brought to the conclusion that the policy proposed by this treaty is at war with the interests of the home producers of sugar, of the sugar-refiners on the Atlantic, and is seriously injurious to the revenue.

But this is not all. The advantages seemed to this country by the treaty are inconsiderable, and in many respects illusive. Many of the articles, and which we could supply t ditions, and by the conceded maxims of international law. No European power can deny to us the peculiar right to exclude them from possessing what would be a standing menace of danger to us, and the possession of which, by us, would be no menace to them.

But it is one thing to decide that no other nation shall take hold upon the islands and quite another to determine we will not do so curselves. The policy of annexing the islands to the United States is one full of difficulty. It would entail upon us enormous expense, and would make it as important to extend our domain beyond them to protect our possession in them as it is now plausibly argued the possession of them is essential to the security of our Pacific seaboard.

Our strength in defense of our Pacific cost, our ability to protect our Asiatic commerce, to hold our place upon the Pacific, as upon every other sea, must at last depend upon our internal resources, and they are immense. The danger to us from the greatest naval power of the world is balanced by its own exposure to our prompt and powerful attack upon its long and indefensible colonial frontier. We hold the power of peace with her and all other nations in doing justice to all, in entangling alliances with none, in developing and conserving our natural elements of strength, and in making peace with us the interest of all nations, by a liberal and impartial trade and intercourse with them.

The neutrality of the commercial nations as to these islands, the hospitable entrepot for the Pacific commerce of the world, their healthful civilization and development under the common protection and liberal policy of all, and an open but firm diplomacy, which claims only equal but no exclusive rights to this place of refitment and refuge for the wayfarers of the sea, will do more to expand our commerce and secure our peace than the possession of the sovereignty of the islands, and for a much stronger reason than the illusory provisions of this treaty.

The undersigned, were they inclined to the scheme of fix

The treaty already existing, ratified under the administration of President Taylor, (United States Statutes at Large, 496,) contains all that is needed for the security of our peace and the promotion of our commerce, and is in all respects better adapted to make the relations between the two countries intimate and strong than the present treaty, and this is done by the existing treaty without any subjection by an entangling alliance of our financial policy and the regulation of our commerce, internal and external, to the influence and supervision of a foreign people. By adopting this treaty we array the interests of our Pacific and Atlantic States against each other; the one receiving duty free that on which the other pays a tax of 40 to 65 per cent. The refning business of the two sections is jealously antagonized, the one free from burdens the other bears. We give our markets freely to the foreigner, who owes no duty and pays no reciprocal revenue for the bounty conferred, while the home planter bears the taxation we impose, with no equivalent blessing to that vouchsafed to his alien rival. The stranger is free and the children pay tribute, contrary to all principles of justice and good government. Besides, we relinquish a revenue which will find its way into the coffers of the alien planter, stimulating his production, which will freely come, in exclusion of the like products now paying duties. And all these things will result, with no equivalent to this country not fully secured by treaty, upon the imagination of a peril for which we have the amplest defense in our internal strength, or a relative position to other nations, and in the firm adherence to our well-understood courses of international policy.

For these reasons the undersigned must respectfully dissent from the recommendation of the majority of the committee, and do therefore as respectfully recommend that the bill reported be rejected.

W. R. MORRISON. PHILIP F. THOMAS. J. R. TUCKER.

While withholding assent from some of the foregoing propositions, I concur generally in dissenting from the recommendation of the majority of the committee, and in recommending the rejection of the bill.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I have rarely attempted to address this House with a more decided and positive conviction of the rectitude and correctness of my position than I now feel in rising to advocate this measure. Indeed it is very seldom that the House of Representatives is allowed to take part in the discussion and determination of any question relating to our international diplomacy. Under the Constitution of the United States, the treaty-making power is received and or head of the Provident the Constitution of the United States, the treaty-making power is received and or head of the Provident that the Constitution of the United States, the treaty-making power is received. is vested exclusively in the President and the Senate. That instrument also declares that the treaties so made shall be the supreme law of the land. In the early history of our Government it was held that no treaty, of whatever character, should be submitted to the action of the House of Representatives. General Washington held this opinion. In a communication to the House of Representatives, 30th of March, 1796, he said that to him "it was perfectly clear that the assent of the House of Representatives is not necessary to the validity of a treaty." The treaty-making power was absolute in the President and Senate. There are also opinions of Judge Story, of Chancellor Kent, and of other company and distinguishes company to the continuous the Continuous other eminent and distinguished commentators upon the Constitution of the United States looking very far in that direction.

Such, however, has not been the practice. While it has been conceded that the treaty-making power was vested in the President and the Senate, it has been the practice that this power did not extend to those treaties requiring the appropriation of public money or to the changing of existing laws with reference to customs and revenue. Hence it is in pursuance and in the line of that practice that the treaty made with His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands is now presented to this House for its concurrence, so far as its execution and effect are concerned.

Let me premise here that we have but limited authority over this Let me premise here that we have but limited authority over this treaty; we cannot alter, amend, modify, or change one letter of that instrument. While unquestionably we have the right in this discussion to consider the treaty in all its aspects, while it is pertinent to the subject of our inquiry to go into the treaty in all regards as to its effects upon the interests of the Government, yet we are denied the power to change it either in letter or in spirit. It is our duty either to pass the law to carry the treaty into effect or to refree to describe to pass the law to carry the treaty into effect or to refuse to do so, and thus defeat the treaty itself. We possess a negative, and not an affirmative, authority.

Mr. Chairman, I have said that I have never arisen with a graver sense of the importance of a measure than now. I say so because I look to the Pacific Ocean as that vast sea which in the not distant future will be more essential and indispensable to the prosperity and material interest of this great nation than the Atlantic Ocean twice over; and that this treaty if consummated will be a grand step toward the permanent security of these interests, laying the foundation of a permanent prosperity, and the obtainment of rights and exclusive privileges which will be as advantageous in war as they will be valuable in peace.

Westward the course of empire takes it way.

The many hundreds of millions of people inhabiting countries which border upon that sea look to America, look to the United States not only for their own progress, but for something of the spirit of Christianity, intelligence, and education which has been so productive of our own success in the development of our own resources. Hence, sir, a measure of this character, which, in my judgment, tends so directly to furnish the material by which this great future shall be recorded to us is not only of the grayact importance to this opened to us, is not only of the gravest importance to this country, but will, if consummated, form an epoch in the commercial history of this era.

What is the bill before the House? In a few words, it proposes to carry into effect the treaty made with the King of the Hawaiian Islands in January of last year. The treaty provides that within eighteen months after the ratification each government, by its properly constituted authorities, shall take measures for its enforcement and recognicion. The Hawaiian government has already performed its part of this duty. By its legislative and executive authority it has ratified this treaty and performed its part of the obligation in order to give it effect and force. It remains for us now to do our part; and this bill is for that purpose.

This is a practical age. The American people of all other people are probably the most practical. We approach every question with a plain, vigorous, practical common sense. We are not mere theorists. We generalize sometimes for our purposes; but my observation in recent Congresses is that every day we are becoming more and more practical. When a proposition is presented to us, we grasp its strong points, and we determine its merits with reference to the material interests involved. We expect subjects of a public nature to be determined upon through the relative merit or demerit they may possess. We apply the test of utilitarianism in its most comprehensive scope, and reach conclusions, sometimes it is true erroneously, but generally for the public weal as we understand it. When we deviate from this principle we do so from the sophistry of interested advocates, or the narrow prejudices of sections, parties, or leaders. The measure under consideration may be viewed in many lights, and from many standpoints. Some, whose vision cannot penetrate a far-off advantage, will look at it solely as a question of immediate interest—as a bargain between nations to be settled upon homely principles of profit gain between nations to be settled upon homely principles of profit and loss at the present moment, without reference to remote advantages or distant returns. Others will see in it "a job," or a speculation. This class of critics are frequently troubled with night-mare. They are dyspeptic men who, never healthy or happy themselves, will allow no one to be so if they can help it. There are others who are naturally disputations and love opposition, and to be opposed. Therefore I anticipate objection from such quarters to the passage of this measure, quite willing that gentlemen may do so without reference to their motives or their objects.

I am willing if your please to shut my eyes to all the greater and

I am willing, if you please, to shut my eyes to all the greater and higher interests involved. I am willing to concede, as it may be attempted in this discussion to prove, that we are not to derive from this treaty the great commercial, political, and military advantages which I hope to be able to prove we shall obtain from its ratification. We will look at it simply in its most homely, practical, every-day sense: Upon its face, is this a profitable treaty for the United States to make 3

to make

What does it propose? It proposes that certain articles enumerated in the schedules, the growth and product of these islands, shall be admitted into the ports of the United States free of duty; and that certain articles, the growth and product of our country, shall be admitted free of duty into those islands. The precise cost in dollars and cents to the Government of the United States has been figured up how much we are to lose in the way of revenue and what gains we are to receive in return? This is putting it in the most practical way in the world. I do not object to its consideration in that spirit; for looking at in the light of a purely business transaction, if the Government of the United States were to suffer by the bargain, while I might be willing for greater considerations to give it my assent, it might have an influence upon my mind if our loss was to be very great. But I do not concede that.

Ever since a treaty like this has been agitated, the opinions of the Ever since a treaty like this has been agitated, the opinions of the several Secretaries of the Treasury have been obtained as to the probable effect of the free admission of these articles upon the revenue, the trade, and the commerce of the country. Among those Secretaries may be mentioned Robert J. Walker, Mr. McCulloch, Mr. Boutwell, and the present Secretary, Mr. Bristow. In reply to inquiries, official communications have been made to the State Department from each of the heads of the Treasury Department that there could be no possible objection to the treaty upon the simple ground of loss of revenue. The present Secretary replied in a communication of a of revenue. The present Secretary replied in a communication of a most intelligent character, which is referred to in the reports accompanying the bill. The following extracts from this document are worthy of special consideration:

The effect on the revenue of admitting the articles named in the schedule free of duty is first to remit the amount levied on sugar, the quantity of which was, in 1873, (fiscal year,) 15,743,146 pounds, on which the duty, at two cents per pound, is $314,863; and, inclusive of a small amount of other saccharine products, (molasses and melado,) it amounts to $320,345 in all on this class of articles. This is also nearly the average for three years ending with 1873.

The duty on other articles imported and included in the schedule of articles to be admitted free is small in amount, including none of conspicuous importance. The aggregate received is less than $50,000 per year. The entire release of duty proposed by the treaty, therefore, would be nearly $370,600 yearly.

In relation to the question of duty, it is, however, only just to say that the present consumption of sugar on the Pacific coast is rapidly increasing, the increase each year being nearly equal to the total importation of a year from these islands.

For 1873 (the fiscal year) the total quantity of sugar imported at San Francisco was 72,026,072 pounds, and 2,980,339 pounds at Portland, Oregon; together 75,007,011 pounds. In the preceding year the entire quantity was 62,861,460 pounds; a difference of 12,145,545 pounds in 1873 over 1872.

During 1874 the importation was still larger. This increasing importation and consumption therefore causes the question to stand not so much as one of diminution of present revenue, but rather as a check to their increase to the extent of the importation of sugar and other dutiable articles made free. The lack of natural facilities for developing the production of sugar in the islands, embraced in the treaty, would keep down the future proportions of this check.

The Secretary, in conclusion, further states:

The proposed release of this duty would undoubtedly increase this trade, and its increase would go far toward compensating for the loss resulting from the release of sugar from duty.

Should the sugar product so released increase to 25,000,000 pounds yearly, the export trade would probably equal it in value.

In addition to the particular articles of commerce affected by the treaty there are general commercial advantages likely to follow, which can only be alluded to here. The rendezvous so long afforded at these islands for the sailing fleets of the Pacific is still needed; and with the increasing commerce of all the seas bordering the Pacific the demand increases for such aids and facilities as would be afforded through the establishment of American interests in the Hawaiian Islands proposed by the treaty.

I present a statement of the amount of duty collected on the articles enumerated in the schedule of treaty reported from official Statement of the imports into the United States from the Sandwich Islands during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1875, with the estimated duties under the present rates of duty; being the same articles proposed to be admitted free of duty under the treaty concluded January, 1875.

EDWARD YOUNG, Chief of Bureau.

BUREAU OF STATISTICS, February 28, 1876.

Thus it will be seen that taking the past as a basis of calculations

Thus it will be seen that taking the past as a basis of calculations as to the probable loss of revenue, which I contend is not reliable, we shall lose far less than alleged by the opponents of this measure. There are three propositions presented in objection: First, that sugars, which constitute the material leading article to be admitted free of duty, will come into competition with American-grown sugar; secondly, that, by admitting sugar free of duty from these islands, there will probably be a large increase of the production, and that consequently the loss of revenue will be very large; thirdly, that, by making this treaty, we will come in conflict with other existing commercial treaties in which we have provided that like advantages may be given to other nations under like circumstances.

Now, sir, first as to the subject of competition. Is there any gentleman in this House who can see any rivalry between foreign-grown tleman in this House who can see any rivalry between foreign-grown tleman in this House who can see any rivalry between foreign-grown sugar imported into the Pacific ports, sugar grown upon islands in the Pacific Ocean imported into the Pacific ports of this country, and sugar grown in Louisiana? We annexed California in 1846, thirty years ago. The influx of population began in 1848 when gold was discovered, and there has since grown up there a vast empire possessing a large commerce and a bold, enterprising, and prosperous people, paying the very highest price for products of the world whenever necessary to their subsistence or their pleasure; and yet not one pound of Atlantic-grown raw sugar, as such, has been imported into their of Atlantic-grown raw sugar, as such, has been imported into their

Gentlemen can readily see that the enormous cost of transportation, either by rail or ocean, would render it commercially impossible. There is too much Pacific-grown sugar at hand for Atlantic-grown sugar to be thought of for a moment as an article of commerce.

I am surprised, sir, any attempt should be made to arouse sectional opposition to this bill upon the ground that any interest of the Atlantic seaboard is to be interfered with in any regard whatever. The sugars imported into our Pacific ports are principally from Manila, in the Philippine Islands, belonging to Spain, Batavia, an East India Island belonging to Holland, China, Formosa, Swatow, Central America, and Honolulu, which is the sugar in question. It is from those countries and from those alone that ninety-nine hundredths of the whole amount comes into our ports upon the Pacific slope. It is very true that recently switch the transfer of his swery true that recently, owing to the present depression of business, sugarrefiners in New York, where bankruptcy has nearly ruined all except one or two, some persons have sent on commission the highest grade of refined sugar at their own risk across the Pacific Railroad and have supplied some small quantities to San Francisco. But no raw sugar, no sugars of inferior grades such as are now grown upon the Sandwich Islands, no sugar other than that of the lower class, used altogether for the purpose of manufacture, has ever yet found its way from the Atlantic to the Pacific, either from Louisiana, New York, or anywhere else. Therefore I dismiss as scarcely worthy of serious consideration the objection raised to this bill, that it will interfere with the sugar-growing region upon the Atlantic seaboard.

The assumption that we are to lose revenue is based on a fallacy. How can we lose what we do not have? I hope to be able to prove conclusively, if this treaty fails, we will get no more sugar from the Sandwich Islands into our Pacific ports. Other and more powerful nations in some regards than ourselves are ready to make not only a treaty far more favorable to the Sandwich Islands than this would be, but also to make a loan to that government of $1,000,000, if necessary, for the extension of other favors in return.

The report of the committee, Mr. Chairman, refers to some remarkable intrigues which have been going on in the British possessions for the purpose of diverting this trade entirely from the United States to those British possessions in the southern Pacific Ocean. If this treaty fail, instead of getting as we now do some $450,000 a year revenue by duties levied on certain articles, my prediction is that we will not only not get anything, but will lose a golden opportunity to obtain advan-tages which are indispensable to our Pacific commerce.

Do not gentlemen recollect that the amount of revenue we collect on sugar is according to the amount of duty we lay upon it? Have we any guarantee that the present rate of duty will be continued? Until lately did we not lay fifteen cents per pound upon tea and three cents per pound upon coffee? Do we lay any now? Coffee and tea are admitted into the United States free of duty. And why * Because they are articles of prime necessity; they enter into every poor man's household, and have become indispensable to the family comman's household, and have become indispensable to the family comfort and sustenance. But are they any more so than sugar? I am quite prepared to see the day when, by economical administration of this Government, when by honest, faithful, diligent conduct of affairs, when by doing away with the present system of profligacy and extravagance, we shall be able to cut down our governmental expenses from 25 to 33 per cent. And when we have done that, my prediction is that one of the first articles which we shall cease to collect revenue upon will be sugar; sugar will follow tea and coffee, and come in free. This objection to this measure, based upon the hypothesis that we are to lose so much money because we have been in the habit of collecting it, is not reliable. the habit of collecting it, is not reliable.

When they go further and estimate a much larger probable loss by predicting an increase of the population so as to raise, as they say, an aggregate amount of fifty million tons of sugar, my reply is that those islands cannot produce it. The population has decreased from 400,000 in 1779 to less than 50,000, including 6,000 foreigners, in 1875. And it is the native population that furnish the labor. No sugar can be produced except by the manual labor of the natives of those islands. duced except by the manual labor of the natives of those islands. The decrease of the population is a painfully remarkable fact. In round numbers, omitting the fractions, in 1779 it was 400,000; in 1832 it was 130,000; in 1836 it was 108,000; in 1850 it was 84,000; in 1853 it was 73,000; in 1860 it was 69,000; in 1866 it was 62,000; in 1872 it was 49,044, of which 6,853 were foreigners, leaving only a little over forty-two thousand as the total native population of the Sandwich Islands. There has been a gradual extinction of population, a gradual obliteration of the natives of the country, leaving them, as it were, a prey to some more powerful nation to come in and occupy the ground that Providence in His wisdom has determined they shall cease to that Providence in His wisdom has determined they shall cease to occupy any longer. And gentlemen are frightened at this product of a handful of starving natives, lest it may interfere with the revenues of this nation. Now, sir, I will admit everything that may be conjectured as to loss of revenue. They may estimate it at $400,000, at $500,000, at $1,000,000; I will support the treaty notwithstanding. What is the compensation that we get in return, whatever the loss may be? I am treating it simply as a bargain between nations, a bargain between merchants. We give them the privilege of admitting certain articles free of duty. What do they give us in return? First, we get the whole exclusive carrying trade. I know it will be said we have that now. It is true we have the most of it, but if this treaty fail we shall be made to pay such heavy port tonnage and other charges that it will operate to our exclusion hereafter. Other nations will obtain discriminating favors which will in effect deprive us of them altogether. The American flag will cover the whole of that commerce ontward and inward. This is not usual at the present day. Our flag is not seen on the waters of the world as it was sixteen years ago. We have been driven almost entirely from the Atlantic Ocean, not so much by foreign intrigue or aggression as by a ruinous and iniquitous policy and the late civil war. But, sir, upon the Pacific we have something of commercial marine. We hold there the finest line of steamships under the American flag that floats upon any ocean. Let us extend this advantage. Upon the land the flag has been maintained by the specific by the desired transfer. tained by sacrifice, by blood and treasure. Let us maintain it upon the ocean also, and fostering its progress and promoting its extension by the legitimate appliances of the peaceful arts and cultivation of friendship with foreign nations and the firm establishing of fraternity and concord. And when by commercial treaty we can extend that flag, by which we can secure its further advancement and promote the commerce which should be protected under it, it would be the grossest national error, bordering on crime, not to avail ourselves of the opportunity.

We get most of the carrying trade. It is now almost exclusively in American bottoms. We propose to maintain it. But, sir, that is not all. All the products of the United States, whether agricultural not all. All the products of the United States, whether agricultural or manufacturing, that go into the consumption of these people are to be admitted free of duty upon their part. Already, sir, that country does receive some supplies from Germany, from the East Indies, and from New Zealand and Australia, which are British possessions. But when our manufactures, our agricultural products, the products of our soil and of our workshops, shall be admitted free of duty, we shall have an entire monopoly of their trade in the articles we produce which enter into their consumption, to the exclusion of every other nation. Is that no compensation? We are virtually and practically to be placed in possession of that country without the responsibility or the expense of maintaining it. We do not propose to make it American soil. We do not propose to annex it as a territory. We do not propose, as was proposed in the case of San Domingo, to pay any money for it. We do not propose to expend one dollar. We propose to enter into a friendly, peaceful, commercial regulation, which of to enter into a friendly, peaceful, commercial regulation, which of itself and by itself, by the extension of the olive-branch and not the sword, will enable us to obtain such a status that whenever we will it the boon itself will fall gracefully into our hands.

The present duty in the Sandwich Islands, upon all their importations from every part of the world is 10 per cent of release.

tions from every part of the world, is 10 per cent. ad valorem; a horizontal duty covering all of the articles which they propose under their schedule to admit free of duty. That 10 per cent., and in some items more than that, is in the aggregate a duty higher than the duty levied in the aggregate upon the articles of our production which they are to admit free of duty.

Nor is that all the compensation we receive. I desire to call the attention of gentlemen, and I hope they will listen to it, to a most remarkable and unusual provision in the fourth article of this treaty, by which His Hawaiian Majesty stipulates that-

So long as this treaty shall remain in force, he will not lease or otherwise dispose of or create any lien upon any port, harbor, or other territory in his dominions, or grant any special privilege or rights of use therein, to any other power, state, or government, nor make any treaty by which any other nation shall obtain the same privileges, relative to the admission of any articles free of duty, hereby secured to the United States.

After a thorough and critical examination of every treaty made by the Government of the United States from the beginning to the present, I find no treaty containing any such advantages to the United States. The commercial treaties are based upon reciprocity, of interchange of commodities, &c. This treaty is based upon reciprocity so far as the interchange of the commodities of the two nations are concerned, but on terms and conditions which give the United States the entire monopoly of that country; and no other treaty of the like character can be made with England, France, China, Holland, Russia, or any other nation which has territory upon the borders of the Pacific Ocean or elsewhere. Nor would any of those governments attempt for one hour to negotiate for the making of a treaty with this treaty in existence; for, if so, they would hazard an interruption of friendly relations with this Government. Sir, is that no compensation? In view of the great political advantages we gain by this restriction or discrimination in our favor the treaty is desirable, though we should ose twenty times more revenue than is claimed.

To say that this fourth article of the treaty is susceptible of the construction that the Sandwich Islands can make a treaty with another nation under which they may admit certain articles like ours free from duty—I say, sir, in reply, it is impossible for any government to put any such construction on the treaty, because the language is that they shall not, with any other power, state, or government, make any treaty by which any other nation shall obtain the same privileges relating to the admission of articles free of duty. To hold that there is nothing in this treaty to prevent the Hawaiian govern-ment from making similar treaties with other nations is untenable and not to be respected for a moment. The thing is impossible. They are virtually and practically placed in a position where they are excluded from any negotiations of a commercial character or to interfere with this treaty in any regard without our consent, and only with our consent could it be done.

Mr. Chairman, the man who predicts that this continent will at a later period be populated like Asia is no longer considered a dreamer. I think that the child has already been born that will live to see more than one, two, or three transatlantic railways connecting the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. I think the day is not far distant when the States and Territories on our Pacific coast lying west of the Rocky Mountains will contain a larger and a more energetic and prosperous people than we on this side of the Rocky Mountains.

Already we have one great highway to the Pacific. We have steam communication from Liverpool to Hong Kong making three thousand miles across the Atlantic Ocean; three thousand miles across the United States, and seven thousand miles across the Pacific Ocean; and this is but the beginning and scarcely the beginning of the prog-ress and advancement of our future commercial and national power.

The Southern Pacific road contemplated finds its terminus at San Diego on the Pacific coast. It crosses over the southern tier of States to the Pacific coast to San Diego, five hundred miles south of San Francisco. San Diego is directly in line with Honolulu, the capital of the Sandwich Islands. It is in the same latitude, and, by the remarkable condition of the currents and winds of the Pacific Ocean, markable condition of the currents and winds of the Pacific Ocean, is brought nearer by steam navigation than it is by geographical miles. Vessels sailing from and to Japan and China all touch at the Sandwich Islands. This is the natural stopping-place, whether coming from or going to the east from our shore. They touch at this point. Now, whether approaching or leaving the American coast, they steam or sail at least six hundred miles along the coast southward or northward, as the case may be; thus, in all cases, touching a point south of or near to San Diego, and thus bringing the terminus of the Southern Pacific road much nearer than San Francisco is to Japan and China. Japan and China.

Therefore, the southern portion of the Atlantic States are largely interested in this measure, provided they take that natural view of their own interests which has so sufficiently built up their more northern sisters in the American Union.

Indeed, the States of the South have a much larger interest in this question than we of the North. We are already provided with the present Pacific railway, which runs now due west from New York. New York is the great entrepôt which receives the treasures of the New York is the great entrepôt which receives the treasures of the East. We transmit them to Europe, and from Europe they come back to us. By exchange of commodity and exchange of money we have now a monopoly of the transatlantic and transpacific trade. Therefore, if we of New York, taking a broad, comprehensive view of this great nation, standing as the mother of the country, deriving commerce, sustenance, and support from every section and interest, without sectionalism or exclusiveness—a broad, liberal, comprehensive people, who promote their own interest in promoting the interests of the country—are willing to thus said the South Learnot see how any the country—are willing to thus aid the South, I cannot see how any representative of the South can refuse it.

Mr. CLYMER. Will the gentleman yield for a motion that the committee now rise?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I am advised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] that the committee of which he is chairman has an important communication to make to the House of Representatives. I will, therefore, move that the committee now rise, with the understanding that when the Committee of the Whole shall again resume the consideration of the pending bill I shall be entitled to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. There are fifteen minutes remaining of the hour to which the gentleman is entitled.

The motion of Mr. WOOD, of New York, was agreed to.

The motion of Mr. WOOD, of New York, was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Sayler reported that the Committee of the Whole, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 612) to carry into effect a convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, signed on the 30th day of January, 1875; and had come to no resolution thereon. resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sympson, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the resolution of the House for printing the eulogies delivered in the two Houses of Congress upon the late Vice-President Heury Wilson.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the resolution of the House for printing the eulogies delivered in the two Houses of Congress upon the late Andrew Johnson, late United States Senator and Ex-President.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the resolution of the House directing the Committee on the Library to inquire and report concerning any unpublished docu-ments of historical value in the possession of the Department of State relating to the history of the country before March 4, 1789, and also to report as to the expediency and cost of publishing the Monroe papers now in possession of said Department.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested,

House bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1596) granting a pension to Ruth Ellen Greelaud; and

An act (H. R. No. 198) to relieve the disabilities of Robert Tansill, of Virginia.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 2285) authorizing the purchase of additional grounds for the custom-house at Nashville, Tennessee;

An act (H. R. No. 193) for the relief of Ezra B. Barnett, postmaster at Norwich, New York; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 19) on the celebration of the Centennial in the several counties and towns.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 199) for the relief of the estate of the late paymaster Major John S. Walker, United States Army; An act (S. No. 309) for the relief of William L. Nance;

An act (S. No. 382) to appropriate $1,000 to remove the remains of Hon. E. Rumsey Wing, late minister to Ecuador, from Quito to the cemetary at Owensborough, Kentucky;

An act (S. No. 431) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Thomas, widow of General Lorenzo Thomas, late of the United States Army;

A joint resolution (S. No. 9) authorizing Hon. William L. Scruggs, United States minister at Bogota, to accept a present from the Queen of Great Britain.

IMPEACHMENT OF WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

Mr. CLYMER. By direction of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, I ask unanimous consent to submit to the House a report from that committee of so grave a nature that I am quite certain, when it is heard, the House will agree that I am justified in asking that permission at this time. No objection was made.

Mr. CLYMER. The committee of which I have the honor to be the chairman, not having had the services of a clerk to transcribe its proceedings and prepare this report, have instructed me to prepare it, which I have done. I am certain that no one of the clerks at the desk would be able to read it in its present form. I therefore ask the unwelcome privilege to be permitted to read it myself.

No objection was made.

Mr. CLYMER then went to the clerk's desk and read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Expenditures in the War Department would respectfully re-

The Committee on Expenditures in the War Department would respectfully report:
That they found at the very threshold of their investigation such unquestioned evidence of the malfeasance in office by General William W. Belknap, then Secretary of War, that they find it to be their duty to lay the same before the House.

They further report that this day at eleven o'clock a. m. a letter of the President of the United States was presented to the committee accepting the resignation of the Secretary of War, which is hereto attached, together with a copy of his letter of resignation, which the President informs the committee was accepted about ten o'clock and twenty minutes this morning. They therefore unanimously report and demand that the said William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, be dealt with according to the laws of the land, and to that end submit herewith the testimony in the case taken, together with the several statements and exhibits thereto attached, and also a rescript of the proceedings of the committee had during the investigation of this subject. And they submit the following resolutions, which they recommend shall be adopted:

Resolved, That William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, be impeached of high mend shall be adopted:

Resolved, That William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors while in office.

Resolved, That the testimony in the case of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to prepare and report without unnecessary delay suitable articles of impeachment of said William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

Resolved, That a committee of five members of this House be appointed and instructed to proceed immediately to the bar of the Senate, and there impeach William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States of America, of high crimes and misdemeanors while in office, and to inform that body that formal articles of impeachment will in due time be presented, and to request the Senate to take such order in the premises as they deem appropriate.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask the still further privilege of reading the evidence and the accompanying papers, exhibits, and statements in the

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman has a right to do so without asking permission of the House.

Mr. CLYMER then read the following:

EXTRACTS FROM THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE COMMITTEE.

TUESDAY MORNING, February 29, 1876.

The committee met. Present: Messrs. Clymer, Blackburn, and Robbins. Mr. Marsh, a witness, being present, was duly sworn by the chairman, and was examined by the committee. (See evidence.)

Messrs. Blackburn, Clymer, and Robbins submitted statements regarding an interview had by Mr. Blackburn with the wife of the Secretary of War, which were marked C, D, E, respectively, and were ordered to be made part of the evidence. Adjourned to meet to-morrow at eleven o'clock.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, March 1, 1876.

Committee met pursuant to adjournment. Present: Messrs. Clymer, Black-Burn, Robbins, Blass, and Danford.

The Secretary of War, having been notified of the meeting, appeared; whereupon the testimony of the witness, Caleb P. Marsh, taken yesterday, with the several exhibits therein referred to, were read by the chairman. The witness, C. P. Marsh, being also present, the Secretary of War desiring to cross-examine him and wishing time to employ counsel, the committee agreed that when it would adjourn it would be until three p. m. to-day. The chairman was directed to ask leave of the House for the committee to sit during the sessions thereof. Adjourned.

Wednesday, March 1, 1876—3 p. m.

WEDNESDAY, March 1, 1876-3 p. m.

Wednesday, March 1, 1876—3 p. m.

Committee met. All the members present. General Belknap appeared, accompanied by his counsel, Judge Blair.

The testimony, exhibits, and statements taken before the committee were fully read by the chairman for the information of Judge Blair, the Secretary having withdrawn; after which Judge Blair made a verbal proposition to the committee regarding the report which might be made to the House. Whereupon the committee adjourned to meet this evening at eight at the rooms of Mr. Bass, at 1129 Fourteenth street.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, March 1.

Committee met at the house of Mr. Bass at eight p. m., pursuant to adjournment.

The proposition of the Secretary, made at the afternoon session through Judge Blair, was fully discussed, and after mature deliberation was unanimously rejected. The committee adjourned to meet to-morrow morning at 10.30 a. m.

THURSDAY, March 2, 1876.

Committee met at 10.30 a m., pursuant to adjournment.

Judge Blair appeared at eleven o'clock, and presented a letter dated March 2, 1876, signed by U. S. Grant, President of the United States, accepting the resignation of the Secretary of War. (Marked G.)

Dr. Tomlinson appeared, and presented a letter addressed to the chairman, to the contents of which he was duly sworn. (Marked H.)

The witness, Mr. Marsh, being present, was recalled by Mr. Blair, counsel for General Belknap, and was cross-examined. (See testimony.)

The committee authorized the chairman to draft areport in the case to the House, to be submitted to the committee. The committee on motion took a recess until 12.30 p. m.

The committee met pursuant to adjournment, 12.30. There were present the chairman and Messrs. Robbins and Blackburn.

The committee ordered the chairman to address a letter to the President forthwith, asking him for a copy of the letter of resignation of the late Secretary of War, and informing them at what time this day it was received. Whereupon Mr. CLYMER prepared the letter, which was submitted to and approved of by the committee, and sent to the President by a messenger of the House, with orders to wait for a reply.

tee, and sent to the President by a messenger of the House, what decay a reply.

At one o'clock Messrs. Bass and Danford, members, appeared.

The committee having taken a recess for the purpose of considering the request of William W. Belknap, made by his counsel, Judge Blair, to be permitted to appear before the committee to make a sworn statement, it was determined that he should be heard. Whereupon Judge Blair was informed of the decision and requested to have General Belknap appear before the committee at three p. m. this afternoon, if he still desired to do so.

Committee met at three o'clock. Present, all the members.

W. W. Belknap having failed to appear, the chairman submitted the report to the committee; and, it having been unanimously approved, the chairman was ordered to make his report to the House forthwith.

Mr. Caleb P. Marsh, one of the witnesses ordered to be subparated by the committee, being present, was duly sworn according to law:

By the CHAIRMAN:

By the Chairman:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. I reside at No. 30 West Fifty-seventh street, New York; have resided in New York about eight years.

Q. Were you or not appointed or tendered an appointment as a post-trader, at Fort Sill, Indian Territory, in the fall of 1870, by the Secretary of War? If so, under what circumstances was said appointment secured to you? State also if you were commissioned by the Secretary as such post-trader, or, if not, who was ocommissioned, and if any other person than yourself was so commissioned, give his name, the reasons why he was commissioned; if any agreement was made between you and the appointee, state it, or produce it, if in writing, and was such agreement made with the knowledge of the Secretary of War? And state the circumstances connected with the making of that agreement, and all the transactions in detail thereunder, fully and particulary as if you were specially interregated in regard to the several transactions and so fully as to save the necessity of repeated interrogatories.

mand with the making of that agreement, and all the transactions in detail thereunder, fully and particulary as if you were specially interrogated in regard to atories.

The WITNESS. In reply to your questions, I would state that in the summer of 1870 myself and wife spent some weeks at Long Branch, and no our return to New York, Mrs. Belknap and Mrs. Bower, by our invitation, came for a visit to our house. Mrs. Belknap was ill during this visit some three or four weeks, and I suppose in consequence of our kindness to her she felt under some obligations, for she saked me one day in the course of a conversation why I did not apply for a post-tradership on the frontier.

I asked what they were, and was told that they were, many of them, very lucrative offices or posts in the gift of the Secretary of War, and that if I wanted one should ask the Secretary for one for me. Upon my replying that I thought such offices belonged to disables of the secretary of War, and that if I wanted one should not be to disables of the third that I would remember her saying something like this: "If I can prevail upon the Secretary of War to award you a post you must be careful to say nothing to him about presents, for a man once offered him $10,000 for a tradership of this kind, and he told him that if he did not leave the office he would kick him down stairs." Remembering as I do this story, I presume the antecedent statement to be correct.

Mrs. Belknap and Mrs. Bower returned to Washington, and as few weeks thereafter Mrs. Belknap sent me word to come over. I did so. She then told me that the post tradership at Fort Sill was aveaunt; that it was a valuable post, as he understood, and that she had either asked for it for me or had prevailed upon the Secretary of War to agree to give it to me. At all events, I called upon the Secretary of War to agree to give it to me. At all events, I called upon the Secretary of War to agree to give it to me. At all events, I called upon the Secretary of War to agree to give it to me. At all event newspapers about that time reflecting on the injustice done to soldiers at this fort caused by exorbitant charges made necessary on the part of the trader by reason of caused by exorbitant charges made necessary on the part of the trader by reason of the payment of this bonus.

To the best of my knowledge and belief the above is a true statement of all the facts in the case and as complete as I can remember occurrences of so many years ago.

Q. State how the payments were made to the Secretary of War subsequent to the funeral of his then wife, which you attended in Washington in December, 1870; whether in cash, by check, draft, certificate of deposit, bonds, or by express, or otherwise.

whether in cash, by check, draft, certificate of deposit, bonds, or by express, or otherwise.

A. The money was sent according to the instructions of the Secretary of War; sometimes in bank-notes by Adams Express; I think on one or more occasions by certificate of deposit on the National Bank of America in New York. Sometimes I have paid him in New York in person. Except the first payment in the fall of 1870, and the last in December, 1875, all were made to the Secretary in the modes I have stated, unless, perhaps, upon one or two occasions at his instance I bought a Government bond with the moneys in my hand arising from the contract with Evans, which I either sent or handed to him.

By Mr. BLACKBURN:

By Mr. BLACKBURN:

Q. Can you state the sum in the aggregate received by you under the contract with Evans; and what portion thereof have you paid to the Secretary of War, including the first and last payments, which you have stated were not paid to him?

A. I have no memorandum whatever on which to make answer. It is a very simple calculation. The first payment to me by Evans was made in the fall of 1870 at the rate of $12,000 a year. He paid at that rate about a year and a half or two years, and since then at the rate of $6,000 a year. It would aggregate about $40,000, the one-half of which I have disposed of as above stated.

By the CHAIRMAN:

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you receive letters from the Secretary of Waracknowledging the receipts of the sums forwarded to him in the manner you have stated; or did he acknowledge the receipt of the same in any way?

A. Usually when I sent money by express I would send him the receipt of the company, which he would either return marked "O. K." or otherwise acknowledge the receipt of the same. Sometimes I paid it to him in New York, when his receipt was necessary. I have not preserved any receipts or letters. When sent by express I always deposited the money personally and took a receipt from them.

Q. Have you at any time had any conversation with the Secretary of War regarding the post-tradership at Fort Sill or have you corresponded with him regarding the same?

Q. Have you at any time had any conversation with the Secretary of War regarding the same?

A. O, frequently. I have forwarded requests to the Secretary made to me by Mr. Evans, wishing privileges about the fort, such as to sell liquor, &c. I do not remember what action was taken upon them; they were not returned to me. As far as I know, Evans corresponded regarding affairs at Fort Sill through me with the Secretary of War. I never heard of any other way.

Q. Was the contrared between you and Evans ever the subject of conversation between you and the Secretary of War?

A. It never was, as I remember, save in one instance; but am not positive, yet it seems to me when the article in the newspapers regarding affairs at Fort Sill, probably in 1872, about the time the reduction was made in the payments from $12,000 to $6,000, appeared. The next time I saw the Secretary of War he asked me if I had a contract with Evans. I told him I had. I never showed it to him or any one else until I produced it here.

Q. After receiving the telegraphic subpœna from the Sergeant-at-Arms to appear before this committee, which was on Monday, the 21st of this month, did you come to Washington; and, if so, had you an interview with the Secretary of War, and when and where?

A. I came to Washington on Wednesday, the 23d of this month; I went to the house of the Secretary of War, staid Wednesday night, and returned on Thursday evening. I showed him the telegraphic subpœna, and asked him what it meant. He said he supposed it was to state before the committee what I knew about our transactions together. I said I did not like to appear, because I thought my testimony would be damaging to or would implicate him or give him trouble. He said he thought not, and advised me to stay and meet the committee. During that evening my conversation was chiefly with his wife, he being present part of the time and understanding the general tenor of our conversation. She suggested that I could make a statement which would satisfy the committee and exculpat

I had business transactions together for many years, and that all this money I had sent the Secretary was money that she had from time to time deposited with me as a kind of banker, and that she had instructed me to send it to the Secretary for her.

I dined there and spent the evening, and staid all night, retiring aboutr twelve o'clock. The evening was devoted to discussing this matter. I told he that the statement would not hold water before the committee, and even if it would I could not make it. At the same time I was so wrought up and had such anxiety—she pressing and pressing me about it—and having slept little since the receipt of the subpema, and sympathizing with their condition, I did not give them a positive answer that night. I went to bed at twelve o'clock, and I do not suppose I slept a wink. They said they would breakfast about nine o'clock. I came down about eight and met the Secretary alone. I told him I thought I had better leave and get out of the country, for I would not perjure myself for any one; that I could afford to have my throat cut, but not to perjure myself for any one; that I could afford to have my throat cut, but not to perjure myself. He replied he did not wish me to do that, that we could fix it up some other way. I said "I think I had better leave the country." The Secretary said I would ruin him if I left. I said, "I H I go before the committee I will surely ruin you, for I will tell the tsoth." He was greatly excited. When I came down stairs to leave, he followed me and asked me into the parlor, and said, "I want to make a last appeal to you to stay longer." He said if I went he would be ruined. I said I would ruin him if I went before the committee, and I left and took the limited express to New York.

On reaching home I consulted my attorney, asking him if the committee could reach me by subpena if I left the country. I stated the case to him, (Mr. Bartlett, 130 Broadway, Equitable building.) He asked if I was out of the country. I asked him how long I would have to stay.

sketch of Tomlinson; the endeavor was to exculpate the Secretary; there was nothing in it untrue to the best of my recollection, but it did not state the whole truth; it was a very short letter. He took it with the contract inclosed. He said he would take the letter and contract to Mr. BLACKBURN, who would show it to the committee, and that would be the end of it. He left my house at two o'clock Friday morning. At midnight Friday night I was roused up, and had the subpoena of the committee served on me.

Saturday morning about eight o'clock Dr. Tomlinson again appeared. He said he had been to Washington. He wanted to know the first thing if I had been subpenaed. I told him I had. He began talking the whole thing over again, still wanting me to say before the committee what was suggested at the Secretary's. (At the interview on Thursday night he wanted me to lelegraph to the committee, before which I had been subpenaed by telegraph to appear the next morning. Friday—that my wife was sick and that I could not attend. My wife being sick, I consented and did so telegraph.) Recurring to the interview again on Saturday morning, I said I could not make the statement he desired. He said he had seen Mr BLACKBURN in the interval, and had shown him the letter of Thursday night. He then returned it and the contract to me. I said, "Dr. Tomlinson, I have thought of this thing so much it has nearly made me crazy. I am not going to talk about it any more. We will go down to my lawyer and consult him about it." My object being to have a lawyer to tell him how ridiculous the story he wanted me to tell would appear before the committee.

We went down and called on Mr. Bartlett, and I told him the whole truth in the presence of Dr. Tomlinson. Bartlett said I could not manufacture any story if I wanted, and must not if I could. Dr. Tomlinson still insisted that if I could swear that at the time I was at her funeral I made an arrangement with Mrs. Bower, the present Mrs. Belknap, by which, Mrs. Belknap, deceased, and if I coulds swe should go to Washington or leave the country." Dr. Tomlinson said he would return to Washington; he prepared two formulas of telegrams which I would understand.

One was, "I hope your wife is well," was to be interpreted to leave the country. The other was, "I hope your wife is better," which meant "come to Washington."

We then parted. On going home in the street-cars, thinking the whole thing over about the conversation at the time of the funeral, I made up my mind that, although I had stated to Mr. Bartlett that I thought I had had some conversation at the time of the funeral with the Secretary of War about sending this money, yet I was so undecided about it that I was certainly willing to give the Secretary the benefit of the doubt. I thought I was the time of the funeral thin, we parted at one o'clock. He was to leave for Washington at three o'clock. I went to the depot and met him, and told him that on thinking over the matter I was so undecided about the conversation with the Secretary at the time of the funeral that I would give him the benefit of the doubt. He said, "I am very glad to hear this, because my sister, Mrs. Belknap, said this was the fact."

That Saturday evening I got a telegraphic dispatch from Mrs. Belknap which said: "Come to Washington to-night; it is necessary." I received it in the evening. Next morning (last Sunday) I received a dispatch from Dr. Tomlinson, "I hope your wife is better," which, according to our agreement, meant "come to Washington." In the afternoon I got a second dispatch from Dr. Tomlinson, as follows: "Come without fail. Answer." I answered: "I shall come to-night, without fail." I was very glad not to have to leave the country, the conviction having grown on my mind that it would do no good. I reached Washington yesterday morning at 6.30, and stopped at the Arlington, my wife being with me. Was shown to a temporary room at about seven o'clock. I laid down, being greatly fatigued, and at about eight o'clock Dr. Tomlinson called me to the door of the room. He said sworn I made a statement to certain members of the committee of the facts in the case—more briefly, but substantially as I have now answered in reply to your chief interrogatory.

When I returned to the hotel yesterday afternoon, Dr. Tomlinson was waiting at my room at the Arlington to see me. He asked how I got along before the committee. I told him I had told the story from beginning to end, and that at the request of the gentlemen present I was going to reduce it to writing, and appear before the committee to-day at 10.30 with it. He wanted to know how I had stated the fact that all these payments to the Secretary had been made in consequence of the original agreement made with Mrs. Belknap. I said I had stated the facts as they were, according to my best recollection and belief. I told him I would furnish him a copy of the statement I would make before the committee.

I prepared the statement last night, and gave him a copy of it about eight o'clock this morning—being substantially a copy of that I submitted as an answer to your chief interrogatory, save that I have filled up the blanks. Dr. Tomlinson came back to my room at about 7.30 last evening, and I asked him whether he had seen Mr. Blackburs since I had made my statement in the afternoon, and what impression it had made upon the gentlemen who heard it. He said he did not like to say he had seen Mr. Blackburs, but he said he had seen one of the committee, who expressed the opinion that my statement would involve the Secretary. He then made a stronger appeal to me than ever before, saying that I was the friend of the Secretary; that if this thing came out it would ruln him; that his wife was in great trouble, and that if I could state——. I said, "Stop, Dr. Tomlinson; I have about finished my written statement, and I will read it to you." I then read it to him. He said he did not see but that it was all right; that things could be explained yet, if they could prove that this money was originally sent to General Belknap by Mrs. Belknap's order. General B

Q. Did you ever have any business relations of any kind or nature whatever with the late Mrs. Belknap, or the present Mrs. Belknap, or either of them, other than those arising from this Fort Sill tradership? Have you now, or have you ever had, any sum or sums of money, or any evidences of indebtedness or securities of any sort or description whatever, belonging to either of them; or have you at any time been indebted to either of them in any way, manner, form, or description?

A. Never. The present Mrs. Belknap, years ago, may have consulted me on business matters; but there was no monetary transaction whatever between us other than I have heretofore stated.

Q. When was the baby of the late Mrs. Belknap born and when did it die?

A. The baby of the late Mrs. Belknap was born in the autumn of 1870; died during the summer of 1871.

A. It was not.

The foregoing deposition and statement, made under oath, having been carefully read over in full to Mr. Caleb P. The witness C. P. Marsh, being recalled, was cross-examined by Judge Blair. By Judge BLAIR:

Question. In your examination-in-chief you say that Secretary Belknap remonstrated against your going away without appearing before the committee; did the Secretary, in desiring you to go before the committee to testify, ask you to testify to any untruth?

Answer. I certainly don't think he did.

Articles of agreement between John S. Evans and Caleb P. Marsh.

Articles of agreement made and entered into this 8th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1870, by and between John S. Evans, of Fort Sill, Indian Territory, United States of America, of the first part, and Caleb P. Marsh, of No. 51 West Thirty-fifth street, of the city, county, and State of New York, of the second part, witnesseth, namely:

Thirty-fifth street, of the city, county, and State of New York, of the second part, witnesseth, namely:

Whereas the said Caleb P. Marsh has received from General William W. Belknap, Secretary of War of the United States, the appointment of post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid; and whereas the name of said John S. Evans is to be filled into the commission of appointment of said oost-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid by permission, and at the instance and request of said Caleb P. Marsh, and for the purpose of carrying out the terms of this agreement; and whereas said John S. Evans is to hold said position of post-trader as aforesaid solely as the appointee of said Caleb P. Marsh, and for the purposes hereinafter stated:

Now, therefore, said John S. Evans, in consideration of said appointment and the sum of $1 to him in hand paid by said Caleb P. Marsh, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, hereby covenants and agrees to pay to said Caleb P. Marsh the sum of $12,000 annually, payable quarterly in advance, in the city of New York aforesaid. Said sum to be so payable during the first year of this agreement absolutely, and under all circumstances, anything hereinafter contained to the contrary notwithstanding; and thereafter said sum shall be so payable; unless increased or reduced in amount in accordance with the subsequent provisions of this agreement. In consideration of the premises, it is mutually agreed between the parties aforesaid as follows, namely:

reduced in amount in accordance with the subsequent provisions of this agreement. In consideration of the premises, it is mutually agreed between the parties aforesaid as follows, namely:

First. This agreement is made on the basis of seven cavalry companies of the United States Army, which are now stationed at Fort Sill aforesaid.

Second. If at the end of the first year of this agreement the forces of the United States Army, which are now stationed at Fort Sill aforesaid or diminished not to exceed one hundred men, then this agreement shall remain in full force and unchanged for the next year. If, however, the said forces shall be increased or diminished beyond the number of one hundred men, then the amount to be paid under this agreement by said John S. Evans to said Caleb P. Marsh shall be increased or reduced in accordance therewith and in proper proportion thereto.

The above rule laid down for the construction of this agreement at the close of the first year thereof shall be applied at the close of each succeeding year so long as said agreement shall remain in force and effect.

Third. This agreement shall remain in force and effect so long as said Caleb P. Marsh shall hold or control, directly or indirectly, the appointment and position of post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid.

Fourth. This agreement shall take effect from the date and day the Secretary of War aforesaid shall sign the commission of post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid; said commission to be issued to said John S. Evans at the instance and request of said Caleb P. Marsh, and solely for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this agreement.

Fifth. Exception is hereby made in regard to the first quarterly payment under this agreement, it being agreed and understood that the same may be paid at any time within the next thirty days after the said Secretary of War shall sign the aforesaid commission of post-trader at Fort Sill.

Sixth. Said Caleb P. Marsh is at all times, at the request of said John S. Evans, to use any proper influence he may have with said Secretary of War for the protection of said John S. Evans while in the discharge of his legitimate duties in the conduct of the business as post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid.

Seventh. Said John S. Evans is to conduct the said business of post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid solely on his own responsibility and in his own name; it being expressly agreed and understood that said Caleb P. Marsh shall assume no liability in the premises whatever.

expressly agreed and understood that said Caleo F. Marsh shall assume no hability in the premises whatever.

Eighth. And it is expressly understood and agreed that the stipulations and covenants aforesaid are to apply to and to bind the heirs, executors, and administrators of the respective parties.

In witness whereof the parties to these presents have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written.

NEW YORK, February 25, 1876.

DEAR SIRS: I duly received your telegram of March 21, summoning me to appear before you, and answered that I would do so; but my wife has since become so ill as to make it almost impossible for me to leave her for any time, and I today send you a telegram to this effect, and will also give a statement of my connection with the post-tradership at Fort Sill, which will, I trust, avoid the necessity of my leaving home. I will, however, come as soon as I can, or will be happy to see any one or all of the committee at my house in this city.

At the time I applied for the position of post-trader at Fort Sill I presumed that I could furnish recommendations that would secure me the appointment which was afterward promised me. After this I saw Mr. Evans in Washington, and made an arrangement with him, in consequence of which I withdrew in his favor, and hereceived the appointment.

This arrangement was made without the advice or consent of the Secretary of War, neither did he have any-knowledge of such an arrangement from me or any one else, so far as I know, nor was he interested in any such arrangement or the fruits of any arrangement between us.

There never has been, nor is there now, any contract, agreement, or arrangement between the Secretary of War and myself in regard to these matters.

I am, very sincerely, your obedient servant,

The honorable the COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

ARLINGTON HOTEL Washington, February 28, 1876.

DEAR SIES: I herewith inclose copy of letter which I wrote you from New York, but not having mailed it when I received your subpona concluded not to send it. This morning, however, I have thought best to send it to you, in the hope that it may tend to shorten the time of my examination.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. P. MARSH.

P. S. I will bring the contract you inquire for.

P. S. I will bring the contract you inquite the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, Capitol.

Statement of Mr. Blackburn.

After the foregoing deposition was taken, Mr. BLACKBURN said: Without desiring to express any opinion as to the accuracy of the conversations detailed by Mr. Marsh as having occurred between Dr. Tomlinson and himself, relative to any remarks made by me, I think it best to submit to the committee the following statement of facts, of which my democratic colleagues of the committee were promptly advised:

On the morning of the 24th of February, 1876, (Thursday,) about ten o'clock, Dr. William Tomlinson called at my rooms and asked me to go with him to attend to some business, without stating what it was, to which I assented. He proceeded to the residence of General Belknap, and upon arriving there he said that his sister, Mrs. Belknap, desired to see me. I requested his presence at the interview, to which he assented, and he was present during the whole time. In this interview Mrs. Belknap said that the testimony of one Caleb P. Marsh, before the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, would tend to implicate herself in matters that would occasion criticism, but would utterly fail to show any complicity upon the part of General Belknap in the matter of the Fort Sill tradership, and she asked that she might not be made the subject of investigation.

Where the testimony did not tend to involve the Secretary of War, I said to Mrs. Belknap that I felt assured no member of the committee would desire to prosecute the inquiry further than to asceptain that neither the Secretary of War nor any subordinate of that Department was involved. I said to her further that I would communicate the facts as stated by her to Messrs. CLYMER and ROBBINS, of the committee, and would state to them the assurance I had given her. This I did immediately do within an hour after the interview referred to occurred, stating fully to those gentlemen all that had taken place; whereupon both these gentlemen approved what I had said and done, and thoroughly concurred with me in the purpose of prosecuting no investigation that did not promise or tend to implicate or involve the Secretary of War or his subordinate officials. This is the only assurance ever given or conversation had by me upon this subject either with Mrs. Belknap, Dr. Tomlinson, or with any other person whatever at any time, nor am I related or connected, either by blood or by marriag

Statement of Mr. Clymer regarding Mr. Blackburn.

Statement of Mr. Clymer regarding Mr. Blackburn.

Mr. Clymer stated that on Thursday morning, the 24th day of February instant, before the House met, Mr. Blackburn requested him to accompany him to the room of the committee, when and where he stated that he had just had an interview with the wife of the Secretary of War, at her instance, in the presence of Dr. Tomlinson, her brother; and that he narrated to him the conversation between them at the interview, which was in substance as he has stated it. Later in the day, immediately after the House adjourned, Mr. Robeins and myself, at his request, came to the committee-room, where Mr. Blackburn again repeated the substance of the interview; whereupon he was assured by Mr. Robeins and myself that we concurred with him as to the objects of the pending investigation, and that he was justified in giving the assurance that no investigation would be made which did not tend to reach the Secretary of War or some of his subordinates.

F.

Statement of Mr. Robbins.

Mr. Robeins deems it sufficient for him to say simply that on Thursday, the 24th instant, Mr. Blackburn communicated to Mr. Clymer and himself the fact that on that morning the wife of the Secretary of War had very unexpectedly sought an interview with him, and that such interview had taken place. He recounted to us what had passed at that interview, and he has embodied the same in a statement which accompanies the report, which statement accurately recites the matter as he communicated it to us.

The statement made by Mr. Clymer, chairman of the committee, in reference to Mr. Blackburn's communication to us concerning that interview and our opinions and decisions thereupon is in all respects accurate. We all concurred in the idea that it would be our duty to push every investigation which tended to throw light upon the official conduct of the Secretary of War and his subordinates of that Department, however painful might be the performance of such duty; but if we at any time discovered evidence which involved only unofficial persons, and especially ladies, we should not feel bound to prosecute any inquiry which we knew could have no other result than that, for our investigations had nothing to do with private individuals, but only with officials.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 2, 1876.

SIR: I have been informed that my name has been mentioned in connection with the recent charges against the Secretary of War; first, that I attempted to induce the witness, C. P. Marsh, to swear falsely; and that Hon. J. C. S. BLACKBURN, a member of your committee, was a relative, and would suppress the whole matter. What I desire to state is that each of the above statements is utterly and entirely false.

Very respectfully,

WM. M. TOMLINSON.

I demand, in justice to myself as well as to Hon. J. C. S. Blackburn, a personal explanation.

Hon. Hiester Clymer, Chairman of Committee of Expenditures of War Department.

William M. Tomlinson deposes and says that the foregoing statement is just and true to the best of his knowledge and belief.

Sworn and subscribed before me this 2d March, 1876.
HIESTER CLYMER, Chairman. WILLIAM M. TOMLINSON,

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 2, 1876.

Mr. President: Thereby tender my resignation as Secretary of War, and request Its immediate acceptance.

Thanking you for your constant and continued kindness,
I am, respectfully and truly, yours,

WM. W. BELKNAP.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, March 2, 1876.

Sir: In reply to your note of inquiry of to-day's date the President directs me to say that the hour of the acceptance of the resignation of Hon. W. W. Belkmap as Secretary of War was about 10.20 o'clock this morning. A copy of the letter of resignation is herewith inclosed.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

C. C. SNIFFEN,

Hon. Hiester Clymer, Chairman Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, House of Representatives, present.

Mr. CLYMER. Mr. Speaker, I would not if I could, and in my present condition I could not if I would, add anything to the statement of facts which has just been reported to the House. Another occasion may be afforded me to do so. The facts are so clear, so plain, that everywhere throughout this broad land, and throughout Christendom wherever the English language is read or spoken, they will for language the state of the facts are so clear, so plain, the language is read or spoken, they Christendom wherever the English language is read or spoken, they will for long years constitute a record of official corruption and crimes such as has no parallel in our own history, or, so far as I know, that of any other country. And if, in this hour, one sentiment of pity, one word of sympathy, could find utterance from me, it would be because I feel that the late Secretary of War is but the proper outgrowth, the true exponent of the corruption, the extravagance, the misgovernment which have cursed this land for years past. And that being my own reflection, I will discharge my duty best to myself, and I trust to this House by demanding the previous question upon the adoption this House, by demanding the previous question upon the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. KASSON. I beg that my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLY-MER] will give an opportunity for a moment's suggestion before ask-mere an opportunity for a moment's suggestion before asking the previous question on a matter of this great importance.

Mr. CLYMER. I regret that I cann ot oblige my friend—[several Members: "O, yes!"]—and for a reason which he will recognize as just when I have stated that I desire my colleagues upon the committee to be heard before any other members of the House. Therefore, sir,

I demand the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman will allow me to say that there is not the slightest opposition to their all being heard.

Mr. CLYMER. Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield. I demand the

Mr. CDYMER. Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield. I demand the previous question.

Mr. COX. I call for the reading of the resolutions again.

The resolutions reported by the committee were again read.

Mr. CLYMER. I now renew my demand for the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to make an appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania by asking him whether he expects this House to-night after five o'clock and after the adjournment of the Senate, and without the printing of the resolutions and the evidence upon which they are based to yote moon a question of this nature, when even the imare based, to vote upon a question of this nature, when even the impeachability of the officer at present is a point to be considered by the House. However guilty may be the officer arraigned, (and no man has been more pained than myself by this development,) does the gentleman think it right to prevent one word being said by way of obtaining more complete information?

Mr. CLYMER. I will say to my friend from Iowa that if the demand for the previous question be seconded, I will give one-half of the hour to which I shall be entitled to my friends on the committee the hour to which I shall be entitled to my friends on the committee on the opposite side of the House, to dispose of as they choose.

Mr. KASSON. The committee, it is said, is unanimous in this report; and therefore, if there is no opposition, if this is all a proper proceeding, the only question is—

Mr. CLYMER. I do not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BASS. Being a member of the committee, I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if he will permit me.

Mr. CLYMER. Certainly.

Mr. BASS. As I understood, the intention was that members of the committee on this side should be entitled to be heard.

Mr. CLYMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BASS. But the gentleman having one hour only, I understand him now to give away one-half of it.

Mr. CLYMER. I propose to give one-half hour to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BASS] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Dan-

FORD, I that they may dispose of it as they wish.

Mr. BASS. If the gentleman has but an hour, how can he give away half an hour and still leave us the time it has been agreed we shall occupy?

Mr. CLYMER. I do not propose, if the gentleman from New York will understand-I do not propose to occupy one minute of that hour

Mr. BASS. Then I do not understand the chairman of the committee to take away the half hour to which the members of the committee on this side of the House are entitled.

Mr. CLYMER. Certainly not; and the gentleman can dispose of his time as he may desire.

Mr. BASS. As I understand the chairman, he proposes to give onehalf hour of his own time to the members on his side of the House, but not of our time. We propose—

Mr. CLYMER. If you do not desire it, say so. It is a mere matter

Mr. CLYMER. If you do not desire it, say so. It is a mere matter of volition on your part to take it or not.

Mr. BASS. I desire to say—

Mr. CLYMER. Will my friend from New York permit me, in order that there may be no misunderstanding about this matter. I propose that the hour which under the rules belongs to me shall be divided, one-half to be given to the gentleman from New York and his colleague on the committee on that side of the House and the other half hour to the members on this side. The half hour to be given the other side may be apportioned among other members if the gentleman and his colleague so choose or it may all be occupied by themselves.

Mr. BASS. That is what I asked, whether I understood the genwhich could only be done by taking away our half hour.

Mr. CLYMER. I propose no such thing. I demand the previous question, and decline to be further interrupted.

Mr. HOAR. Does the gentleman consider this a political ques-

Mr. RANDALL. This report is unanimous; it is not political.
Mr. CLYMER. I demand a vote on the seconding of the previous question.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. CLYMER. I now yield to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. ROBBINS,] who is a member of the committee. I ask what time

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. Not more than the fifteen minutes allotted to me.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina, took the floor.
Mr. WADDELL. This disorder is disreputable to the House, and I hope some order will be preserved while my colleague addresses the House on this solemn occasion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is resolved that this solemn business shall not proceed in such disgraceful disorder, and he therefore appeals respectfully and personally to every member upon this floor to aid him in restoring and maintaining order. It does not become us to attempt to proceed under such circumstances Order was restored.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, it is my purpose to occupy but a very few minutes of time. I have been so wearied with the physical labor and the mental strain of this investigation day and night for several days that I am in no condition to make a speech in regard to it, and I do not think any member of the American Congress has it in his heart to wish to say very much about this great shame. It is one of those things which we need not take pains to spread before the inquiring and censorious world to the common disgrace of all American citizens, but, if duty permitted, might rather veil it as a reproach to the American name. We of the committee have expressed our ideas in the report and resolutions unanimously submitted by us. Those resolutions, Mr. Speaker, I hope will be adopted unanimously.

It has been intimated that a question arises as to whether they are in order, and whether it is proper to impeach an officer who has resigned. I have not had time to look up the authorities, and am not prepared to speak to that question worthily except to say this, that it certainly cannot be true that an officer who is being investigated and who has been found by the evidence to be a criminal against the laws of the land can flee from justice by any act of his own.

The results of an impeachment, Mr. Speaker, are twofold: One is to remove from office and the other is to disqualify from holding office hereafter. The removal from office is accomplished by the office hereafter. The removal from office is accomplished by the resignation but the other portion of the penalty remains uninflicted. Certainly it is within the power of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment to impose that penalty, and the officer cannot escape it by hasty resignation, which is virtually a flight from justice. I shall not attempt to fitly characterize the manner in which that flight has been in this instance facilitated by the hasty acceptance of his resignation. nation at such an untimely hour and at the last stage of the investigation. It is not necessary to dwell on that. It goes before the I would call the attention of the House to the cases of Warren Hastings and of Lord Francis Bacon, of whom the former was impeached and the latter received sentence, if I mistake not, after they had respectively ceased to hold the offices in which they had committed the crimes and misdemeanors for which they were impeached. And in the proceedings against Warren Hastings, if I am not mistaken, he is described in the articles of impeachment as the "late governor-general" of India. So that these great and remarkable precedents under English jurisprudence sustain the position which is so consonant with reason, that, when a man is found in office corrupt, dishonest, and especially as we have jurisdiction of him by investigation already begun, he cannot deprive us of that jurisdiction by attempting to flee and shelter himself under a resignation. That is the common sense of the case. That, I think, is the law of the case

That is the reason of the case. And that is the view which should be followed in justice to the people we represent.

This is no time to allow easy escapes of men who are found guilty of these high crimes. There is that degree—I do not speak as a politician and will not do so in this case—there is that degree of corruption pervading the public service generally, there is that degree of suspicion attaching to officials in all of their actions in these disordered times, that it is not proper, it is not right, that there should be any shelter here. This case should be probed to the bottom, tried by the highest court known to the country, and a just penalty meted out.

Sir, it is time that the officers of this country should learn that the Government was not made for the officers, but for the people. They ought to be made to feel that they are the servants, and not the masters, of the sovereign people of America; and that, when this great people finds itself shamed and disgraced and outraged by such conduct as has appeared here, an officer guilty of such conduct should be brought to the bar of the high court of impeachment, and there tried in the name of the people and an adequate penalty inflicted, that the officers of this country may learn that when they commit crimes the arm of the people can reach them and punish them however they may attempt to hide themselves away.

Let us, if American precedents are not clear on this question, make a precedent which shall be clear to those who shall come after us. In this extraordinary case let us make a notable example and do what in us lies to stem the tide of official peculation and plundering and malfeasance which deluges the land, sapping the very foundations of our liberty, bringing disrepute upon popular institutions and almost making a mock of all faith in human integrity.

Mr. CLYMER. I now yield fifteen minutes to my colleague on the ommittee, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Bass.]

Mr. BASS. I have no desire, and I certainly have no ability in my present condition of health, to detain this House by any extended remarks upon this subject. I can only say that it is one so grave that it appals every American citizen.

I regret to have heard the statement that this peculiar instance of official corruption was the outgrowth in any way of our institutions. And I regret to have heard the statement that this instance of official corruption had no parallel either in this land or in any other. should not have to go far, sir, and I think we would not have to leave our own borders to find not only its parallel, but to find one compared with which this is almost as white as the driven snow.

But, sir, no man upon this floor can defend or in anywise extenuate the offense which has been disclosed by the testimony which has been laid before the House to-day. There is no apology for it, there is no excuse for it, there is no justification for it before the American people. The sale of office, the sale of a place, the sale of a contract under the laws of the United States by an officer thereof is not only an offense which strikes us as citizens as being one which should receive our earnest condemnation, but this Congress and this House of Representatives heretofore have had occasion to place upon the statute-book a denunciation of this offense. And it is already by the laws of the land not only made a crime punishable in our courts, but in this case, the offense having been committed by a high officer of the Government, it is punishable also by impeachment.

I have not time to review the testimony, but in brief I can only say that it seemed to the committee—and about this there was no disagreement—that there was no substantial doubt of the truthfulness of the statement made by the witness Marsh. That is in effect that in the year 1870 an arrangement was made by which the Secretary of War, or some member of his family, was to receive a sum equal to about the half of $12,000 per year for bestowing upon a man named Evans, through the witness Marsh, the office of post-trader at named Evans, through the witness Marsh, the office of post-trader at Fort Sill; that that contract was continued in existence for a period of a year and a half or two years; that then, there being some complaints with reference to the ill-treatment of the soldiers—which might be expected from the sale of this place and the high bonus paid as the price for obtaining the contract—complaints being made, the bonus was reduced to the half of the sum of $6,000 annually; and from that time down to this very day that contract has been in full force and effect, and the money, according to the testimony, has been remitted quarter by quarter in one form or another to this high officer of the Government as a compensation for his action in continuing Evans in the position of post-trader. the position of post-trader.

Now, sir, a statement of this case as it appears baldly upon this testimony is sufficient to justify the vote of every member of this House for the resolutions which have been presented by this com-

Mr. LAMAR. Will it interrupt the gentleman for me to make an inquiry ? Mr. BASS.

Mr. BASS. I think not, if I have time enough left.
Mr. LAMAR. It is simply as to the question whether the resignation of the officer divests this body of the power to present articles of impeachment, and whether the gentleman's attention has been directed to that point?

Mr. BASS. I was about to say a few words on that question after I had said one or two more things on the facts of the case. I have already called the attention of the House to the fact, admitting that these are the facts, that this offense has already been denounced by law in the statute-book as a crime liable to be punished by imprisonment; also that it is a high crime and misdemeanor for which we are entitled to impeach.

Now this question is a very important one, whether the House of Representatives, which has the sole power of impeachment under the Constitution, has jurisdiction to impeach, as General Belknap is no longer Secretary of War, whether it has jurisdiction to frame and to present to the Senate of the United States, for trial, articles of impeachment against him. The members of the committee have individually examined that question to some extent. I think it has been done more extensively by the gentleman last on the floor, [Mr. RobBINS, of North Carolina,] but I have become convinced that we have the power, although, so far as I am concerned, I was not able to find direct authority in America; yet English authorities seem to maintain that we have that jurisdiction. That is, however, a jurisdictional question. We are sitting as a grand jury, and as it is a jurisdictional question, leave the officer to plead it before the tribunal which is to try him, and if they decide in his favor then well and good. There is perhaps a doubt upon the question. I would not say that it is entirely free from doubt. It is not entirely free from doubt. But my own judgment is that that provision of the Constitution which says that the officer impeached shall not only be removed from office, but be disqualified from holding any office of honor, trust, or emolument under the United States Government, can be accomplished in no other way except by his impeachment. When an officer finds that he is to be impeached, on the very day the articles of impeachment are to be presented can he evade the consequences of his guilt and shield himself from the vengoance of the law by sending in his resignation? So that I say under the circumstances of this case, if there is doubt about this I say under the circumstances of this case, if there is doubt about this matter, we, sitting as a grand jury to present articles of impeachment, should put him on trial and let the tribunal that tries him decide the question of jurisdiction. The very section of the Statutes at Large to which I have alluded provides that an officer convicted by a judicial tribunal of an offense like this shall be forever disqualified from holding office; but gentlemen will bear in mind that any man convicted before a court may be perfound but if he be convicted by the victed before a court may be pardoned, but, if he be convicted by the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment, he is beyond the power of pardon, and his disability continues forever.

With these views upon the question, and having no doubt as to the facts found by the committee, and the burden of my convictions being that this body has power to present articles of impeachment in a case like this, I think we ought to present them, and leave the question of jurisdiction to be decided by the tribunal before which he is to be

I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Hoar.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor for five minutes.

Mr. HOAR. The division of this hour, the committee being unantimed to the second of the second demonstrate the second dem imous in one opinion, both republicans and democrats, seems to me to imply the opinion on the part of the chairman of the committee that it is in some way a political question. I utterly disclaim and repudiate such an idea. No person can be more desirous to punish any public officer found guilty of a crime like this charged upon the late Secretary of War than the republican members of the House. wish simply to call attention to one matter. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Robbins] alluded to the fact of the hasty acceptance of this resignation. This House solemnly determined in the case of Whittemore that the formal act of resignation by the officer terminates the office, and that any American citizen can lay down an office held by him without the consent or acceptance of anybody whatever; it is a mere formal matter.

Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Bass] says he has not investigated the question whether after the civil office has terminated vestigated the question whether after the civil office has terminated the officer can be impeached, but he thinks that the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. Robbins,] who said he had not looked at the authorities, as I understood him, has investigated it more than any other member of the committee. Now, Judge Story, after full discussion, lays down the doctrine that it cannot be done. In England any citizen can be impeached, and therefore the English case of Warren Hastings does not apply. In America no man can be impeached but a civil officer, and when he ceases to be a civil officer he ceases to be within the literal construction of the Constitution. In America to be within the literal construction of the Constitution. In America the only judgment rendered is removal from office as the principal with the incident of perpetual disqualification to hold office, and the Constitution provides that the punishment of the offender shall take place as if the impeachment had been had by trial before a jury and a judge.

Now, for these offenses there is provided in the statutes of the United States a punishment of fine and imprisonment, and perpetual disqualification to hold office. Now, sir, this man being out of office, and if found guilty it being impossible to get him back into another, I protest against this hot haste without even having the testimony printed, and determining the question whether it is expedient that all the authority of this House shall be exercised, when it is very likely that when this evidence is printed it may be found that the House may adopt the conclusion to which the committee have arrived; but it seems to me unworthy of this great occasion, and if I stand alone, I stand here to say that this distinguished officer should not be impeached in this way under the previous question, without having the evidence in print on which he is charged, without giving these gentlemen who are sworn to support the Constitution an opportunity to decide upon the question on which such a jurist as Judge

Story has expressed an opinion.

Mr. CLYMER. I will yield fifteen minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN.]

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to ask, if you can go back to an officer who has resigned, then can you not go back forever?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts
[Mr. Hoar] has expired.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, I trust that when I shall have finished what I propose to say on this occasion, this House will see that it was not necessary for me at the beginning to protest that I am actuated neither by feelings of personal bitterness nor by feelings of party prejudice. I am glad to know that the position in which I stand upon the record in this case refutes the one charge and my utterances here shall disprove the other.

I am glad to know that in that record it appears that I and my colleagues on the committee have given to the world proof irrefutable that nothing was left undone that it was in our power to do to shield and shelter from dishonor every one except those whose acts it was made our duty to investigate. I will not consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts who has just preceded me [Mr. Hoar] shall make this a political or a personal question. I will not, in justice to honorable gentlemen upon that side of the House, consent that we shall be put in the position of the prosecutors while they take the position of the defenders.

It is a question that addresses itself to every mind here alike, I care not which side of the Hall he sits upon or what may be his party affiliations. It is not a party question; it is a question as to whether proper action shall be taken with regard to one who has brought disgrace upon himself, dishonor upon the station to which he had been elevated, and repreach upon the country of which he was a distinelevated, and reproach upon the country of which he was a distinguished and prominent official. I will not stop to pass criticism upon the manner in which it was sought by that official to evade the penalty due to his offense. I will not undertake to say that he who with unprecedented if not indecent haste received that resignation did so to relieve that officer from those penalties—I will not say that this was the purpose. But I will say this: That if this is an unprecedented case, as gentlemen have said, it is unprecedented in more respects than one. It is the first instance in the history of this country—and to the honor of the country be it said—that any one claiming manhood and holding an exalted position has sought to shelter himself from legitimate inquiry by consenting to, much less actually interposing, the dishonor of a self-sacrificing wife. This much is due to her. to her.

This House is not a jury trying an issue. It is the grand inquisition of the country. We stand here in the capacity of a grand jury. If this indictment shall be found, if this true bill shall be returned, it is not competent for this House to pass upon the issue. Gentlemen tell us that because the late Secretary of War is no longer in official position, therefore this House has no right to pass the resolutions upon the Clerk's desk. I deny it, and I rest upon authority. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] says that Judge Story has decided this to be the case. I deny it.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman misunderstood me. I said that Judge

Story said it was a very doubtful question.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I decline to be interrupted. I read from section 801 of Story on the Constitution:

Another inquiry growing out of this subject is whether, under the Constitution, any acts are impeachable except such as are committed under color of office, and whether the party can be impeached therefor after he has ceased to hold office.

And in section 805 he says:

It is not intended to express any opinion in these commentaries as to which is the true exposition of the Constitution on the points above cited. They are brought before the learned reader as matters still sub judice, the final decision of which may be reasonably left to the high tribunal constituting the court of impeachment when the occasion shall arise.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman read the close of section 801? Mr. BLACKBURN. I decline to be interrupted. That is the utterance of that great jurist. I will quote another. Rawle, in his commentaries on the American Constitution, says:

From the reasons already given, it is obvious that the only persons liable to impeachment are those who are or have been in public office.

Now, sir, you may go back to the trial of Hastings, the record of which is before me. It shows that he was impeached more than one year-about a year and three months-after his service had expired. In the articles of impeachment themselves he is referred to and described as "the late governor-general of Bengal." It was about fif-serbed as the the governor-general of Bengal. It was about inteen months after the expiration of his service before those articles were ever presented or that impeachment ever had.

I do say, and I assert it without fear of contradiction, with the authorities before me, that it is in England a settled question, but that in this country it is an open question. And, now the issue is submitted, will the American Congress say that in this state of facts, with the question undecided, with no adjudication to guide us, with the expounders of our constitutional law indicating that that court of final resort which holds its sittings in the other wing of this Capitol should be left to pass upon this issue when the occasion shall arise, will you, I ask, in such a state of facts shrink from your duty, refuse will you, I ask, in such a state of facts shrink from your duty, refuse to discharge that which rests upon you as an obligation, and say that, because there may be the mist or the shadow of a doubt, you will refuse to impeach this officer? You cannot do it.

In the Durell case, which was, I believe, before the Forty-third Congress, I find that the following discussion took place:

Mr. Nielack. I understand it to be a settled rule—the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Butler,] however, has investigated that subject more than I have done or have been required to do—that an officer cannot escape impeachment by reason of resignation. I beg therefore to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts if the committee have considered that question; whether they might not impeach him still, if they think that the circumstances sufficiently justify?

Mr. Butler, of Massachusetts. In answer to the question of the gentleman from Indiana, I will say that as the Constitution imposes the punishment of disability from holding office hereafter, it is entirely competent for the House to go on with the impeachment; and it has been so ruled over and over again. But Judge Durell is an old man, and there will be no practical benefit in going on with the impeachment.

Mr. RANDALL. There might be, as an example.

Sir, there is the record of a prominent member of the gentleman's own party, one who had made it a subject of special inquiry. He states to the House that a resignation does not protect the officer from impeachment; and no man then gainsaid the statement. I do not undertake to say that it is susceptible of demonstration that this House has the right under the Constitution. I have before me a copy of the Constitution in which I have marked clauses bearing upon this question; but I have not time now to read them. I do not undertake to say that it can be proven to a mathematical demonstration that this House has the power; but I say that no man can undertake to assert that it has not the power, and that in this state of the case we must of necessity act in the manner proposed by these resolutions.

But, sir, in order to show gentlemen on the other side of the House the condition in which they would place their own official at the other end of the Avenue whom they have put in power if we were to adopt their view, I read from Bacon's Works, volume 16, page 370:

On the 2d of May, the seals having been sequestered, the House resolved to proceed to judgment on the next day.

In this interval, on the evening of the 2d of May, the chancellor wrote to the King, "to save him from the sentence, to let the cup pass from him; for, if it is reformation that is sought, taking the seals will, with the general submission, be sufficient atonement." These, his last hopes, were vain; the King did not, he could not, in-

What is it that members on the other side of the House would tell What is it that members on the other side of the House would tell us? Will you say to the country that he whom you have placed in power at the other end of this avenue is able to rob an American Congress of a right and a power that a King of Great Britain could not take from Parliament? [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.] Is that your theory?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. You do not give us an opportunity to say whether it is or not.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It used to be the theory that the king could do no wrong; but the man has never yet been found in this land who no wrong; but the man has never yet been found in this land who was bold enough to say that the President could do no wrong. If that man who uttered that memorable sentence, "Let no guilty man escape," holds it in his power to rob the Representatives of the American people of their right to prefer accusations or pronounce censure upon self-convicted official criminals, then tell me, some one, where is the barrier to be found beneath whose shelter the liberties of this people can rest secure?

Mr. HOAR. Does the gentleman claim—
Mr. BLACKBURN. I submit to no interruption.
Mr. HOAR. Then I make the point that the gentleman's time has expired.
The SPEAKER. It has not expired.

Mr. HOAR. I want to know whether the gentleman claims that Congress has the right to punish men.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky declines to be in-

Mr. BLACKBURN. And I hope this interruption will not be taken out of my time.

Mr. Speaker, I simply desire in the moment or two that may be left me to make but one additional statement. I am the last man who would introduce one atom of politics into this discussion. It is not admissible here. I know that members of this committee on the other side of the House were as earnest in their indorsement of this report as the gentlemen of the committee who sit around me. We have seen no difference in the committee-room as to this report, and I appeal to the manhood of this House that there shall be no party difference manifested here in its adoption. If fraud has been perperence of the House that there shall be no party difference manifested here in its adoption.

trated, if criminality exists, if corruption has been proved, then let the Representatives of the American Congress so declare, send the issue to the court where it must finally be tried, and if he is to go scot free, if we are unable to punish where guilt is almost openly confessed, let the responsibility for that exemption rest upon other shoulders than ours.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CLYMER. I now yield for fifteen minutes to my colleague on the committee from Ohio, [Mr. DANFORD.]

Mr. DANFORD. Mr. Speaker, I should not claim the attention of the House for a moment were it not for the fact that I am a member of the committee making this report.

One word in response to the remarks made by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Blackburn,] as to the right or power of the President of the United States to rob this body of its right to present articles of impeachment against the late Secretary of War. The resignation of that officer was tendered and it was accepted, but in my judgment the acceptance of that tender in no manner changed his position toward the country. He had a right to vacate the office, and no power could compel him to remain.

The question as presented for the consideration of this House, so far as the attitude of this officer is now concerned, is not changed by the action of the President in accepting his resignation. I concede, Mr. Speaker, there is some doubt in my mind as to the right of this House to present articles of impeachment against a citizen after he has retired from office, but I have assented to the report and resolutions now before us for action, willing to remit the question of jurisdiction to the Senate. I believe if the House had the time to read the testimony and to consider it as the members of the committee have considered it, there would not be on this side of the House one single dissenting voice in agreeing to these resolutions.

I do not agree, sir, that the conduct of this officer is a legitimate-outgrowth of the principles of the party in power, as intimated from the other side. No; the shame which he has brought upon the country is an outrage upon the political party which he in part represented in the Cabinet of the President.

And I desire to say that it is my hope there will not be a single vote on this side of the House against these resolutions. Let us deal with this man in such manner as to teach all persons who in the future may occupy such high and exalted position that swift punishment follows in the wake of such an outrage as he has inflicted upon the people of this country.

Mr. Speaker, I desire in consideration of the fact that this officer comes from the State of Iowa, to yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. Kasson,] at his request, the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has ten minutes.

Mr. KASSON. A few years ago, sir, there went from my State a young, well-educated, and gallant gentleman to fight the battles of his country. He passed through them all; and after the war was over the President of the United States invited him to the very distinguished honor of a seat in his Cabinet, putting him practically at the guished honor of a seat in his Cabinet, putting him practically at the head of that Army of which he had been a humble but distinguished and meritorious officer. This morning for the first time the delegagation from Iowa heard that this gentleman, who had been so much respected in his own State and so much honored in the nation, had been found guilty of receiving compensation for some act of official function and that that compensation had been continuous. The House will judge of the emotion with which we from that State lis-tened to the reading of the evidence. I never heard anything with greater interest; and when, at the close of the reading of the resolutions, I made an appeal to my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLY-MER,] not for myself only, but for my colleagues, whose pride and the honor of whose State were so touched by the character of the report, for some moments' delay, in order that we might find what there was in that evidence in extenuation of what seemed to be so great a misdemeanor on the part of a public officer, we were met by a demand for the previous question. Not a word to be allowed except by grace to see whether this great stain ought to be put not only upon the nation, but upon that State which hitherto had been glad to honor this distinguished citizen.

I regret it, Mr. Speaker, for we desire in no respect to claim exemption for him from any of the penalties which his action deserves. If the power rested with us we would not ask that one single penalty justly due that officer upon the evidence should be withheld; but when, from the mere listening to that evidence, I find that one of the most painful features disclosed by it is in the fact that not one word of it, until the death that broke up a home had occurred—that not one syllable of evidence touches the officer in question, am I to be blamed that I want a night, or that my colleagues wanted a night, to ascertain the extent of his personal wrong by reading the evidence in print? And when I find the most delicate relations of human life in our proceeding here are they are involved in our proceeding here are they are involved. in print? And when I find the most deficate relations of numan life involved in our proceeding here, as they are involved in that evidence, domestic relations so delicate I dare not allude to them in detail, is it astonishing that I think it but just we should have an opportunity to consider whether there was anything to be said in extenuation of what appears by the resolutions which accompany the evidence to be so great a misdemeanor.

But it is too late to go back of this. We have been refused the opportunity. Now, I only ask the attention of the House to the question whether they do not need more time to ascertain whether this tion whether they do not need more time to ascertain whether this ex-officer is impeachable. Gentlemen speak of it as if impeachment were designed to inflict the proper punishment of an offense. It is not so. Impeachment has no such design. Impeachment is to protect the public from the continuance in office and, at the discretion of the Senate, from the restoration to office of the officer guillity of the misdemeanor. The statutes of the United States provide the punishment for such an offense to be ascertained by a jury and to be fixed by a court. If his impeachment were refused, he stands liable to the laws of the land, and the punishment prescribed by those laws he must submit to.

The Constitution says that-

The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

How are you going to remove this gentleman from office? He is How are you going to remove this gentleman from office? He is out of office. In England, commoners as well as high officers of the government may be impeached, because the House of Commons is the grand inquest of the nation. But references to English authorities are of no account to us. Our rights are limited by the Constitution; and if this man be impeached, the Senate cannot execute the provision of the Constitution which declares that he shall be removed from office upon conviction. If he is liable to impeachment, let it be understood that we are all, without a dissenting voice, for impeachment. But if the House is establishing a precedent which may be dangerous for the future and does not rest upon constitutions. may be dangerous for the future, and does not rest upon constitutional right, we should pause and consider by the aid of a report from the Judiciary Committee the question of our right to make this impeachment, and that is the whole object for which, sir, I stand here now upon the floor.

If there be not a limit by statute, as there is not, of the time to which you can go back to impeach a retired officer, any committee of this House may to-morrow report that Jefferson Davis, who was once Secretary of War and was a Senator of the United States, was guilty of a conspiracy to overthrow the Government of which he was an offi-cer, and you may present at the bar of the Senate an impeachment of that officer to prevent his again holding office in this country. So you may take the case of any ex-officer of the United States, Ex-Sec-retary Floyd, Jacob Thompson, and others. You may impeach any man whom you charge with having been guilty of a high misdemeanor at any time while in office. There would be no limit to your power.

Gentlemen, do you wish to establish such a precedent without even the consideration of the Law Committee of this House?

That is the question to which I desire the attention of the House, and I refer gentlemen to section 790 of Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, in which he says it is the peculiarity of our republican government that its impeaching power is confined to persons holding office. I will read the whole section:

From this clause it appears that the remedy by impeachment is strictly confined to civil officers of the United States, including the President and Vice-President. In this respect it differs materially from the law and practice of Great Britain. In that kingdom all the King's subjects, whether peers or commoners, are impeachable in Parliament; though it is asserted that commoners cannot now be impeached for capital offenses, but for misdemeanors only. Such kind of misdeeds, however, as peculiarly injure the commonwealth by the abuse of high offices of trust are the most proper and have been the most usual grounds for this kind of prosecution in Parliament. There seems a peculiar propriety, in a republican government at least, in confining the impeaching power to persons holding office. In such a government all the citizens are equal and ought to have the same security of a trial by jury for all crimes and offenses laid to their charge when not holding any official character.

Section 805, quoted by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Black-burn,] referred to other points; not this one, which is discussed by Judge Story in the section which I am reading:

Judge Story in the section which I am reading:

To subject them to impeachment would not only be extremely oppressive and expensive, but would endanger their lives and liberties by exposing them against their wills to persecution for their conduct in exercising their political rights and privileges. Dear as the trial by jury justly is in civil cases, its value as a protection against the resentment and violence of rulers and factions in criminal prosecutions makes it inestimable. It is there, and there only, that a citizen in the sympathy, the impartiality, the intelligence, and incorruptible integrity of his fellows impaneled to try the accusation may indulge a well-founded confidence to sustain and cheer him. If he should choose to accept office, he would voluntarily incur all the additional responsibility growing out of it. If impeached for his conduct while in office, he could not justly complain, since he was placed in that predicament by his own choice; and in accepting office he submitted to all the consequences. Indeed, the moment it was decided that the judgment upon impeachment should be limited to removal and disqualification from office, it followed as a natural result that it ought not to reach any but officers of the United States. It seems to have been the original object of the friends of the National Government to confine it to these limits; for in the original resolutions proposed to the convention and in all the subsequent proceedings the power was expressly limited to national officers.

I commend this section to the attention of gentlemen. All that I

I commend this section to the attention of gentlemen. All that I now ask is a report from the Committee on the Judiciary on this question before the House commits itself to this first precedent of the kind in the history of the country.

Mr. CLYMER. I believe there is a shred of time left?

The SPEAKER. There are two minutes left of the hour.

Mr. CLYMER. I yield that to my friend from North Carolina [Mr.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I just want to say, in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Hoar,] who says that the same punishment may be inflicted by indictment as by impeachment, that there is a material difference. A person convicted and disqualified by indictment may be pardoned by the Executive, but a man convicted and disqualified by impeachment cannot be.

Mr. HOAR. That is correct.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. In reply to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] I would say in regard to Senators that it was decided in the Blount case in 1798 that a Senator cannot be impeached, because he is not an officer of the United States.

[Here the hammer fell.]
The question was taken on the resolutions, and they were unanimously adopted.

Mr. CLYMER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLYMER. I desire to ask that the report and testimony, with the accompanying statements and exhibits, be printed in the usual form, and also in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER appointed the following as the committee called for in the second resolution:

Mr. Clymer, Mr. Robbins of North Carolina, Mr. Blackburn, Mr. Bass, and Mr. Danford.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Dob-BINS for four days; to Mr. SINGLETON until Monday next, on account of sickness; to Mr. BAKER, of New York, until the 18th instant, on account of sickness in his family; and to Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky, until the 14th instant, on account of sickness in his family. And then, on motion of Mr. SPRINGER, (at six o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. AINSWORTH: Remonstrance of J. Hodgkinson and 86 others, against the repeal of the duty on linseed and linseed-oil, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. CAMPBELL: Memorial of the Re-organized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, in conference assembled at Council Bluffs, Iowa, that more decisive measures be inaugurated in the suppression of alleged misrule and tyranny in Utah, to the Committee on the Judiciary on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CAULFIELD: The petitions of citizens of Chicago, Illinois, for the repeal of the check-stamp tax, to the same committee.

By Mr. BANKS: The petition of Foster Henshaw, for compensation for damages sustained by the change of grade of streets in Washington, District of Columbia, to the Committee for the District of Colum-

Also, the petition of John Shanahan, for compensation for damages sustained by change of grade of streets in Washington, District of Columbia, to the same committee.

By Mr. COX: The petition of Captain John Graham, that authority and jurisdiction may be conferred upon the Court of Claims to award him a just compensation for the damages and loss sustained by him on account of the detention of three steamships in the harbor of New York by order of the President of the United States, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. DURHAM: A paper relating to a post-route from Speedwell, in Madison County, to Locust Branch, Estill County, Kentucky, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. FAULKNER: Four petitions of citizens of Preston County, West Virginia, that steps be taken in co-operation with other gov-ernments for the settlement of international difficulties by arbitration, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. GOODE: Memorial of Assistant Surgeon James Phillips, that his commission may be made to bear date from the 21st of April, 1862, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. HARTRIDGE: Papers relating to the claim of M. Rawls, to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. HATCHER: A paper relating to a post-route from Jackson to Wittenberg, Missouri, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. HENKLE: The petition of citizens of Annapolis, Mary land, for an appropriation to improve the harbor of Annapolis, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr, HOLMAN: The petition of Almira H. Thompson, for pay for services rendered as a nurse, and for moneys expended in taking care of sick and wounded United States soldiers, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. JOYCE: The petition of J. M. Haven and 8,000 others, for the appointment of a commission to investigate and report the effects of the liquor traffic in the United States on the health and intelligence, &c., of the country; to prohibit the importation of alcoholic liquors in all places where Congress exercises exclusive legislation, and to require total abstinence from alcoholic liquors as a beverage on the part of all officials of the United States, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS: The petition of 52 citizens of Detroit, Michigan, for authority for the construction of a bridge across the river at Detroit, Michigan, to the Committee on Commerce.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 3, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Byron Sunderland, D. D. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved. EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT protempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to the requirements of the eighth section of the act approved July 22, 1854, two reports of the surveyor-general of New Mexico on private land claims in that Territory; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

CREDENTIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the credentials of James B. Beck, elected by the Legislature of Kentucky a Senator from that State for the term commencing on the 4th day of March, 1877; which were read and ordered to be filed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Isaac Strohm, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 236) to give the consent of the United States to the appropriation of certain proceeds arising from the sale of the swamp and overflowed lands in Alabama, for the purpose of furnishing other and additional accommodations for the indigent insane and idiotic persons resident in said State;

A bill (H. R. No. 280) to amend the act entitled "An act to appropriate lands for the support of schools in certain townships and fractional townships not before provided for," approved May 20, 1826;

A bill (H. R. No. 1752) to restore certain lands in the State of Iowa to settlement under the homestead law, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 1771) to declare forfeited to the United States certain lands granted to the State of Kansas in aid of the construction of railroads by act of Congress approved March 3, 1863;

A bill (H. R. No. 2039) to amend sections 2450 and 2451, and to repeal section 2452, title 32, chapter 11, of the Revised Statutes;
A bill (H. R. No. 2427) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend an act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies," approved March 13, 1874; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2452) to extend the time to pre-emptors on the public lands.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. WHYTE. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote just taken in regard to an adjournment over. I will not press the motion just now

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider the vote just taken will lie upon the table, and can be taken up at any time.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HOWE. I present a petition of quite a number of laborers under certain contractors upon the Fox and Wisconsin River improvement, praying to be compensated the amount due them from the moneys due the contractors at the time they failed to go on with their work. This petition is transmitted to me through the Chief of the Engineer Corps. I move its reference to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DORSEY presented the petition of Alexander Davis, of Arkansas, praying compensation for supplies taken by the United States forces during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on

He also presented a petition of colored citizens of Arkansas, soldiers in the late war, praying the repeal of certain laws relating to bounties and pensions to colored soldiers, and the enactment of such laws as will place the colored soldiers on the same footing as to the granting and payment of pensions as white soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas, in favor of the presence of an eather Committee on Military Affairs.

favor of the passage of an act by Congress refunding the cotton tax collected in the years 1865, 1866, and 1867; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Saint Francis County, Arkansas, praying that the aid necessary to insure the early completion of the Texas and Pacific Railroad be granted; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. SARGENT. I present a memorial from a large number of merchants of San Francisco, the number and character of the signatures being such as to show that they represent the opinion of the mercantile class of that city, respectfully protesting against the repeal of the bankrupt law, and asking that the same may be amended in accordance with a bill which they send to me and which I shall ask leave to introduce. They submit that "a proper national bankrupt law is almost a necessity in a country composed of so many distinct districts, and is beneficial to both creditor and debtor;" and they justify these premises by statements of the operation of the bankrupt law. I think the memorial is very strong both in the source from which it emanates and in the reasoning by which they sustain it. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DENNIS presented the petition of Thomas D. Purnell, Horace Payne, and over one hundred other citizens of Maryland, praying an appropriation for the improvement of the Potomac River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORTON. I present the petition of a convention of colored men in Texas; and as it is short, I will ask to have it read by the Secretary

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be read, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

We, your petitioners, would respectfully represent that the present constitution of the State of Texas provides that free schools shall be maintained in this State for at least four months in each year, and that by the terms of the act of Congress permitting Texas to resume the exercise of the rights and privileges of a State in the Union she is forbidden to abrogate that article in her constitution.

And we, your petitioners, would further represent that, notwithstanding the solemn and binding nature of the compact thus entered into between the Government of the United States on the one hand and the State of Texas on the other, the present State government has by nonfeasance practically destroyed our system of free schools.

And your netitioners would further represent that the destroyed our system of free schools.

And your petitioners would further represent that the proposed new constitution now pending for adoption silently ignores the existence of a compact between the General Government and the State of Texas in relation to the subject of education, and fails to make provision for an efficient system of free schools.

And your petitioners would further represent that, in addition to other funds, the new constitution proposes to appropriate that portion of the public domain granted to the State of Texas for the purpose of establishing an agricultural college to an institution to be used for the education of white youths exclusively:

Wherefore, to the end that a sacred and beneficent compact made in the interest of civilization and good government may not be wantonly and presumptuously violated, and that we may be protected in our rights as citizens of the United States, we pray your honorable body to take such action in the premises as will cause the State of Texas to keep in good faith her part of the aforesaid compact; and we, your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

Done in convention of the colored people of the State of Texas and in the city of Honston this the 14th day of January, A. D. 1876.

V. W. CUNY,
President.
JAMES P. BALL, Secretary.

Mr. MORTON. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I beg leave to call the attention of that committee to it.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, presented the petition of M. T. McQueen, administratrix of the estate of John W. McQueen, deceased, praying compensation for property appropriated by the military authorities of the United States during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of James Curtis, of Escambia County, Florida, praying compensation for services as master and pilot of the schooner James Buchanan from the 13th of December, 1863, to June 5, schooner James Buchanan from the 13th of December, 1863, to June 5, 1865, at $75 a month; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RANDOLPH presented a petition of citizens of Newark, New Jersey, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, in favor of the establishment of a weekly mail-route from Kiel to Memee post-office, in the county of Manitowoc, Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of William Colburn and other citizens of Polk County, Wisconsin, praying for the establishment of a post-route between Osceola Mills and Alden, in that State; which was re-ferred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

ferred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Washington, in which they respectfully represent that "Francis W. Pettygrove was the regularly appointed and duly qualified and acting clerk of the United States district court, holding terms at Port Townsend, Jefferson County, in and for the third judicial district of Washington Territory, and performed the duties of the said office from the 13th day of April, 1853, until the 1st day of February, 1857; that the compensation to which he was entitled by law from the United States was about the sum of $3,750; that the accounting-officers of the Treasury neglected to credit his account or to pay the compensation aforesaid." They therefore ask that the claim be considered by Congress. I move the reference of the memorial to the considered by Congress. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Claims.

Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of Charles C. Harris, late of Company A, First Regiment Rhode Island Volunteers, praying compensation for services rendered to the United States Government during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ANTHONY. I also present two memorials numerously signed by very respectable scientific men and agriculturists, asking Congress to take some measures in regard to the noxious insects that have been so destructive to the crops in the West. The originals of these memorials have been presented in the other House, and these are certified copies. I believe the Senate has been in the habit of receiving such copies as memorials, but I am not certain. As a bill has been reported relating to the subject of these memorials, I ask that they lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorials will lie on the table. Mr. BAYARD presented the petition of George R. Dennis, of Mary-Mr. BAYARD presented the petition of George R. Dennis, of Maryland, and accompanying papers, praying compensation for damages to his schooner William J. Dennis, alleged to have been caused by being run into and sunk by the Government steamer General Meigs; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of J. G. Brown and others, eitizens of New York, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, and the amendment of the committee.
Mr. BAYARD. I ask to what this bill relates. It is quite incomprehensible as read from the desk.

Mr. SPENCER. The bill makes the 22d of February a legal holiday, as far as the District of Columbia is concerned. The amendment is to make the 12th of February also a legal holiday, the 12th of February being the birthday of Abraham Lincoln.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WITHERS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSTON, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Matilda Barnett be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

EXPENSES OF ALABAMA SENATORIAL INVESTIGATION.

Mr. MORTON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the sum of $15,000 be appropriated from the contingent fund of the Senate to defray the expenses of the investigation into the facts attending the election of Hon. George E. Spencer as a member of this body by the Legislature of Alabama, to be disbursed on the warrant of the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives at twelve o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m., by the hands of Mr. Green Adams, its Chief Clerk:
Mr. President, the House of Representatives has passed the following

Resolved. That a committee of five members of this House be appointed and instructed to proceed immediately to the bar of the Senate, and there impeach William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States of America, of high crimes and misdemeanors while in office, and to inform that body that formal articles of impeachment will in due time be presented, and to request the Senate to take such order in the premises as they deem appropriate.

And it has Ordered, That Messis. Hiester Clymer of Pennsylvania, W. M. Robbins of North Carolina, J. C. S. Blackburn of Kentucky, L. K. Bass of New York, and Lorenzo Danford of Ohio be the committee aforesaid. At one o'clock p. m. the Sergeant-at-Arms announced the committee from the House of Representatives, who appeared at the bar of

The committee advanced to the area in front of the Chair, when Mr. CLYMER said: Mr. President, in obedience to the order of the House of Representatives we appear before you, and in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States of America, we do impeach William W. Belknap, late Secre-tary of War of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors while in office; and we further inform the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same. And in their name we demand that the Senate shall take order for the appearance of the said William W. Belknap to answer said impeachment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee of the House of Representatives, the Senate will take order in the premises.

The committee thereupon withdrew.

Mr. EDMUNDS subsequently offered the following order; which was read:

Ordered, That the message of the House of Representatives relating to the impeachment of William W. Belknap be referred to a select committee to consist of five Senators.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I offer this order in accordance with the usual prec-Mr. EDMUNDS. I offer this order in accordance with the usual precedents. Proceeding upon the principle of the thing, I should think it would be better to refer a message of this kind to some one of the standing committees of the Senate; but following the usual course in such cases I have framed the order in this way.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont whether that is the usual course?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir; that is the usual course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.
By unanimous consent, the Chair was authorized to appoint the committee; and Messrs. Edmunds, Conkling, Frelinghuysen, Thurman, and Stevenson were appointed.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. MORTON on the 5th March, 1875:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback be admitted as a Senator from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years, beginning the 4th day of March, 1873.

The pending question being on the amendment of Mr. Edmunds to insert the word "not" before the word "admitted."
Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I suppose that every Senator has ot tired of hearing this question discussed, and would be glad to have it decided; and I suppose, also, I am bound to presume that every Senator has been very anxious to have it decided for more than a year last past, but, for some good reason undoubtedly, it has been found difficult to get the question to a point where we were to determine it finally one way or the other, until now; and for one I express the hope that after we shall have now commenced upon it it will stay until it is finally determined. I do not intend to occupy a great deal of the time of the Senate upon the subject, but its importance is such that I feel justified in taking such little time as may be necessary to express views that I entertain, although I have once done so already.

We are acting in this particular case under the Constitution of the United States, which points out to us what our duty is. It declares

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its

The solemn declaration of the Constitution is then that we are to The solemn declaration of the Constitution is then that we are to be the judge, not the partisan, not the politician, not the patriot, not the citizen, but we are to be the judge holding up impartially the scales of justice under the law and determining this question in a judicial way according to the law. There is no room that I can perceive for my being allowed to persuade myself that this man ought not to be admitted because his politics should happen to differ from mine, or because his race should happen to differ from mine; and on the other hand I can conceive of no excuse upon which Senators with a different opinion could be allowed to persuade themselves to believe the other hand I can conceive of no excuse upon which Senators with a different opinion could be allowed to persuade themselves to believe that any consideration of wish, expediency, interest, peace even, should interfere with the calm majesty of the guiding law that appeals to us as judges and in no other way, and that should have its free course. And I have felt something of chagrin, sir, on one or two of the occasions when this subject has been before us, at seeing what seemed to me (although I hope I may have been mistaken) to be something of that spirit which, proceeding from the best motives, is yet if allowed to affect a question of this kind equally fatal to the true interests of the country and to the real perpetuity of the Constitution as if some motive of partiality or prejudice or expediency should find a place in considerations still less grave than these.

If, then, I am right in supposing that our duty is a narrow and a simple one, and that we are to exclude from it every knowledge of the politics of this claimant, every knowledge of everything which his vote in this body if admitted may affect, of everything which the absence of his vote here may affect, the question is what are we to do? It has been said, Mr. President, with great force and with still greater repetition that whatever may be the right of this gentleman greater repetition that whatever may be the right of this gentleman to a seat in this body, the question before us now is simply a question of prima facies and that we are not now called upon to consider whether the body of men who elected him to this office was the Legislature of the State of Louisiana or not; but we are only called on to look upon the paper which is presented to us under the great seal of that State and attested by the signature of the person who as we all agree was acting as the executive of that State at that time, and then swear in the candidate, and at some convenient time proceed to consider whether we have received an intruder or whether we have received a Senator of the State of Louisians. of the State of Louisiana.

That philosophically would strike every one in the first instance as bordering upon the absurd; and yet it has often happened, and it will often happen again undoubtedly from the very necessity of things, that it is discovered sometimes that a person who has been received upon aparently satisfactory evidence of his right to the seat turns out not to have been entitled to it at all. But in this particular instance it unfortunately happens that the resolution which the Committee or Privileges and Flortions has proposed to us does not repostable. on Privileges and Elections has proposed to us does not undertake to deal with the question in that way. I ask, Mr. President, that it may be read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The pending resolution is in the following

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback be admitted as a Senator from the State of Louisiana, for the term of six years, beginning the 4th day of March, 1873.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The resolution, you will perceive, Mr. President, is a full, a complete, and final declaration of the admission of this man as a Senator for the full term for which he claims to be elected; and it could be truly said, if we were to adopt this resolution, that on the face of it we had declared that he is entitled to be a Senator from the State of Louisiana for the full term for which he was elected. It is not a simple resolution that this candidate shall be sworn in upon his credentials, and then a proposition that the question shall be referred to a committee for investigation; but it is a definite and final proposition, which, upon the face of it, as I have said, would foreclose the question as the final and deliberate judgment of the Senate upon the whole case. But, of course, that imperfection could be easily corrected; and therefore it is not worth much while to devote one's self to debate about it. But as it stands it is not, as I say, a simple resolution that this man shall be sworn in as a Senator, either with or without the addition that the subject shall then be inquired into, but it is a full and complete final sentence on the subject.

Passing that, what is this prima facie case which is offered to us? What is this paper? It bears the great seal of the State of Louisiana. How do we know that to be the great seal of the State of Louisiana? We know it upon precisely the same ground that we know that there is a Legislature of the State of Louisiana, or that there is not a Legislature of the State of Louisiana, or that in the year 1863 there was no Legislature of the State of North Carolina—I mean no constitutional Legislature under the Constitution of the United States. How, then, do we get at the first knowledge, the first step on the subject of this prima facie? We get it by the judicial knowledge—to borrow a phrase of art which we are supposed to possess, whether, in fact, we do or not—that this seal is the seal of the State of Louisiana. We do not get it by proof; we do not get it by attempting to hear, try, or determine the question; but we get it, as I say, by that judicial knowledge which the laws of the land impute to everybody called upon to administer, as we are here, either legislative or judicial functions.

Therefore, Mr. President, this paper, on the face of it, is an official paper, emanating from some executive authority or person acting in executive capacity in the State of Louisiana. Does our judicial knowledge stop there? When we are obliged to go so far in order to have a prima facie case in respect of the credentials of any Senator, does the law cut off our judicial knowledge at exactly that point and declare that beyond that there cannot be imputed to us any judicial knowledge at all? No, sir. That is not the law; it is not common sense. This body, in my opinion—and the law is all one way upon the subject—was in a constitutional and legal sense just as well advised of the state of legality or the want of the state of legality of the Legislature that elected this man before the inquiry made by the Committee on Privileges and Elections as afterward. That inquiry, in the judicial sense, was an inquiring to inform the conscience of the Senate just as we refer to a lexicon or to a law-book or to a precedent in our statutes. We are bound to know in short what are the Legislatures of the various States, which bodies if there are two, or whether a particular body, if there be only one, is the government of that State or is the chief officer of any department of it. Can there be any question of that proposition? Certainly there can be none. If that be true, then this paper is not a prima facie case, as it is called, unless we also have the judicial knowledge that the body of men who purport to have elected him was the Legislature of the State of Louisiana. That can be pretty well illustrated if we only turn the case over to what it actually was a little while ago.

also have the judicial knowledge that the body of men who purport to have elected him was the Legislature of the State of Louisiana. That can be pretty well illustrated if we only turn the case over to what it actually was a little while ago.

Suppose that Governor Kellogg, as I shall call him for convenience—and governor in fact he was and is—had chosen to certify the credentials of the gentleman elected by what was called the McEnery legislature, should we not all have said that we knew that that body of men was not the Legislature of the State of Louisiana? I do not say that all of us would have said that we knew that, but all of us would have been bound to say that we knew it one way or the other. Some of us it may be would say we knew it not to be the Legislature, others might say we knew it to be the Legislature, just as judges differ in respect to what is the law or what is a public fact that all judges are bound to take notice of. One judge is of the opinion that the law is so, and another that it is different, and yet there is but one law for all. I do not think there would have been found many Senators, certainly not on this side of the Chamber, who, if Governor Kellogg had certified the election of a man by what is called the McEnery legislature, would have for a moment considered that the broad seal of the State of Louisiana concluded us prima facie for a single moment from the knowledge that the persons who undertook to elect that man were mere private citizens or a mob. Nothing is better settled in the whole course of jurisprudence than that we are bound to know first and last and all the time what body of men, if any, in a given State compose its Legislature. Therefore, when this paper came to us, even if we had taken no steps upon it at all, if this were the first day of its presentation, just as if from any other State, we should be bound to know either that the body of men who had undertaken to elect the candidate possessed the quality which the Constitution requires, that of being the Legisla sessed the quality which the Constitution requires, that of being the Legislature of a State, that they did or not.

It is not, therefore, Mr. President, a case like the numerous cases that have been cited where a person presents himself with credentials from the executive of a State in established relations to the Union and having a legislature competent to elect a Senator at that time, and where the only question possible is the detail of the circumstances under which or the methods by which the election was procured or the qualification of the person himself under the Constitution to hold the office. In such a case we can well see that the paper must be taken, for the time being, to represent an apparent case of authority, and the person is sworn in and then we inquire. But in a case like this the very prima facies depend upon what, as I have said, we are bound to know: that the body of men who elected him were competent to do it. Suppose that the State of Vermont should undertake to elect another Senator while both of her regularly-elected Senators are still here, not having resigned, and there should be presented at your desk, under the broad seal of that State and the signature of its recognized executive, the commission, as I will call it, of the fresh Senator; the credential which sets forth that he is elected. That paper is just as prima facie on the face of it as any other paper could be, only you are bound to know outside of it that it has not any jurisdiction to rest upon. And therefore, I take it, you would not swear in the third Senator and conclude, as the supreme court of Louisiana concluded in one of these contested-election cases, that a man who had the last commission was prima facie the best man, and that he was entitled to be the judge, instead of the man who had the first one; unless, indeed, you felt bound by the decision of the supreme court of Louisiana. If you did, as some of us do, perhaps, you would be obliged to do that.

This is not a question of technical right. It has been stated by some of the honorable Senators who have maintained the propriety of admitting this gentleman, that he has been no party to any of the proceedings through which the Senate has obtained information for its guidance respecting the state of affairs in Louisiana, and therefore, as to him, all that we may know of the condition of things in the State of Louisiana must be taken for nothing until it shall be gone over again when he is before the body. I submit that that is a grave mistake. This is a public question, as well as a private one. It is a question which enters into the right of every State and of all the States; and it is not a question between private party and private party in respect of whose controversies information obtained externally to the cause cannot be treated as evidence. It is the matter of the United States; and the right of this gentleman to this place, if he have any, is only incidental to the great right of the States under the Union and the Constitution to be represented here, and to the great right of the nation to have them represented here.

Then, Mr. President, if this is in some sense a public question, or even if it be a purely private question, we have before us in a public and in a lawful way, affecting everybody who may be concerned in it, the condition of affairs in the State of Louisiana at the time this gentleman purports to have been elected. We are informed in a lawful and regular way, binding upon everybody, either that the body of men who elected him was competent to do so or that it was not. It is immaterial to our knowledge of the state of affairs there whether we may be of opinion that that body of men was legally constituted or whether we may be of the opposite opinion. Why, sir, the affairs of the Government could not go on for a single month if the two Houses of Congress, as well as the courts of the United States, did not take official and judicial notice of what bodies of men in the various States administer the high offices of state and compose its government. It would be totally impossible, for it would drive us, as it would drive the courts, to whom a similar rule must apply if to us, to begin every cause, and for us to begin every inquiry with that preliminary one to find out whether the Legislature of the State of Ohio or of Indiana, in whose name there purports to be a memorial presented here, was the body of men that it pretended to be. Sir, it is impossible to reflect on this subject without, as it seems to me, and speaking with great deference to those who think otherwise, coming to the very border of absurdity, unless we hold that, without any trial, without any inquiry, except such inquiry as I have said judges make to inform their consciences, we take notice who are the legislatures of the States, who are their governors, and who are their courts.

So then we have here before us a part of these very credentials and the very foundation upon which their validity rests, this body of men, claiming to have been the Legislature of the State of Louisiana; and we have before us all the knowledge attainable or that can ever be attained upon the question whether they constituted the constitutional tribunal of that State authorized by the Constitution of the United States at the time to elect a Senator to this body.

There is, then, Mr. President, no such thing as a prima facie case before us in the sense in which it has been urged upon your consideration. We have before us a complete case. One part of it is the paper which represents under the seal of the State that this gentleman has been elected by a legislature, and we have before us as another part of it and inseparably connected with it the fact that this body of men exercised their powers under a claim the history of which we know; and therefore we have before us, one way or the other, the fact that these credentials come from a legislature of Louisiana or the fact that they do not. There is no knowledge to be gained upon the subject, there is no one-sided view or first view to be taken of it. It is all here, and in the very nature of things in a case arising as this does, it was all here from the first, I submit.

But, Mr. President, we have gone further still. When this paper was first presented, I believe there was no Senator in this Chamber who supposed that it made what is called a prima facie case and that it entitled the gentleman named in it to be received at all unless in the judgment of the Senate the body of men who elected him were at the time they elected him the constitutional Legislature of that State. The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. Morton] twice at least, if not three times, as the Journals of the Senate show, has moved, and the Senate on his motion has ordered, that this paper should be referred to the proper committee of this body in order that the circumstances under which it came into being and the lawful existence of the body of men whose mandate it purports to be might be ascertained for the information of this body. And yet, after all, when at last all other grounds fail, as I believe they do upon fair discussion, we are brought back again, after all that has taken place, and asked to face the question as one upon the paper alone, with no eyes judicial or political to look beyond it, and to seat this man by the solemn judgment of the Senate for the full term for which he claims to have been elected. I do not think that that will be a good thing to do. Whatever Senators are of opinion that this man ought to be admitted are ever Senators are of opinion that this han ought to be admitted are bound of course to say so and vote to admit him, whether it is agreeable to their wishes or not, if they can allow themselves to have any wishes on such a subject. But I beg them not to do it upon that unhappy delusion that they are only deciding a prima facie case which may some time or other be decided some other way. Let us "face the music," as the saying is, Mr. President, and determine either that that body of men was a constitutional Levislature of the State of that body of men was a constitutional Legislature of the State of Louisiana on that occasion or that it was not, and do not let us delude ourselves into the idea that we are conveniently avoiding the grave question which lies under these credentials and are making for the time being a half disposition of the case upon the face of the paper. If we were to do that, the first blush that the law books say is a prima facie case would, I fear, be a blush that would last a good

If, then, we have a matter here under consideration, instead of a paper, what have we to do? We have to determine whether this body of men was a legislature; and to determine that, we have to deter mine under the Constitution and the laws of the State to which it claims to belong how it got its authority to be a legislature and how it came into existence. We cannot avoid that. The charter of our it came into existence. We cannot avoid that. The charter of our authority and the duty that is imposed upon us compel us to judge of the election of this man as well as of his qualifications, which may arise in respect of age or citizenship or whatever. We are bound by the very language of the Constitution, diligently chosen, to judge of this man's election, and I take it the very first and fundamental step in an election is to find a body competent to elect. There can be no dispute about that. Then the question is, what was this body of men? How they appeared as a fact in the State-house in Louisiana, and what they did as a fact, there is no dispute about. The mandate of a judge of a court of the United States in advance excluded from that capitol every person but this particular body of men; and soldiers of the United States in aid of the marshal, as it was their duty to do on the face of the law, crossed their bayonets over the doors, and under that shelter this body of men got together. That all that was unwarrantable, and an outrage upon the first principles of law and upon the first principles of government, is so well stated by the present chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in his report on the subject, that I need not recur to it further.

But the honorable Senator says that that may be all true, and yet als body may have been the legal body after all. No one can disthis body may have been the legal body after all. No one can dispute that it may have been the legal body; but it does not come to us with that bloom of liberty, and peace, and equal rights upon its face that it would do had it come under some other circumstances. scill, if the men who in that way assembled together and made this election were the lawfully elected members from the various parishes of that State, undoubtedly I should say that the circumstance that they got together by aid of the Army would not interfere with the validity of this election. These men must have been elected, according to all the notions we have hitherto had about law, by the people of the various parishes. They must have occupied some other attitude than that of being popular men, who, if they had been candidates, would have been elected. They must occupy some other attitude than that of being popular and patriotic men, who, but for the tude than that of being popular and patriotic men, who, but for the fact that voters did not go to the polls, would have been elected; and, according to the laws of Louisiana and its constitution, they must have been elected by the votes cast at the ballot-box on the day of the election. I believe there is no dispute as to that being the law and the constitution of the State of Louisiana.

The next step under that consitution is that the returns of these various local elections shall be sent to the secretary of state, and by him laid before the Legislature, with a list of the persons who, from those papers, appear to have been elected members. Everybody agrees that that was not done. There has not appeared anywhere any paper or claim in all this investigation that anything like a majority of this body of men had any such title to their seats as the laws of Louisiana, if you take them as they read, and as the constitution of Louisiana, if you take it as it reads, required them to have in order to be members. The returning board, composed of Mr. Lynch and others, upon whose certificates they had assembled themselves together, did not possess, as the committee reported, a single one of those returns from the voting-places of the people; and if they had possessed those returns, as far as we have any evidence upon the subject in this book-and it is pretty full-setting aside the question of two, in this book—and it is pretty full—setting aside the question of two, or three, or four parishes which are referred to by one of the gentlemen at the very last end of this book as having papers forged in respect of them, this majority would not have appeared to be elected by the papers if the Lynch board had possessed the papers.

But Senators say, and say truly, and I should be glad to state it as strongly as any other republican Senator can, that great fraud and tumult and commotion, organized in order to defeat what was believed to be the will and the wishes of a majority of the people, had intervened, and therefore that these candidates of our party did not have a fair and therefore that these candidates of our party did not have a fair and therefore that these candidates of our party did not have a fair chance. So I believe; but, unhappily the constitution and the laws of Louisiana do not say that its Legislature shall be composed of men who do not have a fair chance to be elected. It says that it shall be composed of men who are elected by votes that are put into the ballot-box and counted out and returned and proved in a certain way. Ah, sir, if the constitution and laws of Louisiana had provided that the Senate of the United States or any other body should hold that to be its Legislature which the Senate believed ought to have been on be its Legislature which the Senate believed ought to have been on right principles its Legislature, I should have no difficulty in voting that that was a good Legislature. I might have wished to change some of the material in it belonging to both parties, perhaps; but speaking of it as a body, it would be perfectly easy to do that. But, as I have said, our mission is a narrow one. We are to judge of an election; and as a judge we are bound to look at the constitution and law under which that election took place, and we have no right to look at anything else. It may be a great misfortune; it is a great misfortune, if it is true, and I believe it is, that a majority of the people of the State of Louisiana have been unjustly and unfairly deprived ple of the State of Louisiana have been unjustly and unfairly deprived of their right to a free election; but it would be a still greater evil, as it seems to me, if this body, the great conservator of the peace of this nation and of order among its several parts, should decide, in spite of the Constitution and in spite of its duty, that we are to recognize as a Legislature a body of men who were not elected according to the constitution and the laws of that State; for in order to gain a temporary seeming good we should inflict a blow upon the American constitutional system of politics that would last it to its grave. Sir, we must stick to the Constitution and to the law, however disagreeable it is to us, as it is to me on this particular occasion to find myself obliged by what appears to me to be a clear duty and in a clear case to come to a resolution which I wish were otherwise; but there is no help for it, so far as any of us see it in that way.

I have stated before—at the last session, I believe—what I will not now go over in detail and what is stated by this committee in its renow go over in detail and what is stated by this committee in its report, that it is quite plain to me that what is called the registration or returning law of Louisiana is in violation of the constitution of that State. But for the time being I pass that by and come to what the returning board may do, treating it as a valid law for the purposes of this part of what I have to say. I am certain that everybody would agree, or I should suppose that everybody would, that a special tribunal like this returning board has no other authority to create or to certify members of the Legislature or any other officers than that which the law gives them. They are not a body of general than that which the law gives them. They are not a body of general jurisdiction; but all that they can lawfully do is authorized by the jurisdiction; but all that they can lawfully do is authorized by the statute under which they act, and whatever is not authorized they have no more power to do than any other private citizen of the State of Louisiana. What are they to do? They are to receive from the various supervisors of registration at the various parishes at the close of the election the returns of the votes cast in each of the parishes for the members of the Legislature. "Within ten days after the closing of the election," the law proceeds to say, "said returning officers shall meet in New Orleans to canvass and compile the statements of votes made by the supervisors of registration, and make returns of the election to the secretary of state."

That is what the law says they are authorized to do. It does not give them any authority anywhere to canvass or compile or deal with ny other thing than the statement of votes made by the supervisors of registration in the various parishes of the State. The State of Louisiana in passing this law did not confer upon this body of men the power to return any one or certify any one as elected to any office, except they did it upon a sworn and quasi judicial examination of certain papers described in the statute, and these papers are described by such ear-marks that it is impossible to misunderstand what they are. They are to be official documents, signed and returned by the supervisors of registration in the various parishes. That is the whole jurisdiction of this board on the face of the law. I have never heard it denied, and yet it is equally true, and everybody within the sound of my voice knows it, that the board that certified the election of this Legislature did not possess and never possessed a single one of these official documents which alone they had any right to deal with at all.

You may say, sir, that the failure under the law of Louisiana of the returning board to receive these returns, their failure to count them, whether willful or otherwise, should not be taken to defeat an election in the State. I would say so too. But if you say that, it does not give that body, the returning board, any authority other than that which the statute gives them. You may resort, it may be, to evidence aliunde, as the lawyers say, go back to the original returns and ascertain as a fact that the body of men who assembled together were the but when you do that, you have not got this body of men; you have got another body of men, some of these to be sure, but far less than a quorum in either of the two houses.

Then it goes on to say:

Then it goes on to say:

The governor shall at such meeting open, in the presence of the said returning officers, the statements of the supervisors of registration, and the said returning officers shall, from said statements, canvass and compile the returns of the election in duplicate. One copy of such returns they shall file in the office of the secretary of state, and of one copy they shall make public proclamation by printing in the official journal and such other newspapers as they may deem proper, declaring the names of all persons and officers voted for, the number of votes for each person, and the names of the persons who have been duly and lawfully elected. The returns of the elections thus made and promulgated shall be prima facie evidence in all courts of justice and before all civil officers until set aside, after a contest according to law, of the right of any person named therein to hold and exercise the office to which he shall by such return be declared elected.

What are they to do, then, after they shall have made this canvass and compilation? They are to make promulgation and return; but they are to promulgate and return to the proper office of the State only those that are made "thus," in the language of the statute; they are to certify only the result of an examination of the original documents which are to come to them, and their canvass and compilation of those; and, therefore, the certificate furnished by this board to the secretary of state, or made up by him upon their return, stating that this body of men were the persons elected to that Legislature, was in direct defiance of the statute itself under which it was pretended to be made, for the statute says that this return shall be made by the returning board upon a procedure "thus," in the language of the statute, entered upon and conducted. They had no right by the statute to make any certificate at all for any purpose, except a certificate of what appeared to be the truth from a compilation of certain documents that they did not possess.

Do not let us mislead ourselves into the inconvenience of supposing that a failure to do this is to defeat the lawful existence of a Legislature. I am only asking the Senate to keep in its mind at this present stage in this subject what were the powers and what was the want of power of the returning board; and, therefore, whatever you may say of the election at the polls, whatever you may say of what appeared by the returns, this body of men confessedly had no proper jurisdiction to act at all; and the returns that they made of these elections, instead of being made pursuant to this statute, were made in direct violation of it. And you will notice, sir, when you turn to their returns appearing in this book, that, instead of following the language of the statute that they are the returns of the statements of votes made by the supervisors of registration, they return that they are the statements "of votes at an election;" because they could not with personal truth either say or swear that they were obeying this statute, and making a return of the statements of votes furnished by the supervisors of registration; and the law says that their certificate shall be prima facie evidence when it is made in the way that that section of the act says it shall be made and in no other.

So then, Mr. President, if you take this statute to be constitutional, if you take this board to be the legal board, which most plainly it was not, except for the judgment of the supreme court of the State of Louisiana, if you take both those things for granted, you still find this body of men destitute of any evidence at all that they have a right to sit there derived from a certificate of this returning board, because the statute says that the certificate shall be prima facie evidence only when the returns are made in that particular way, and the case shows confessedly that they were not made in that way; their own certificate, as I say, on the face of it, shows that they were not made in that way. Therefore I conclude that the title this body of men had, the prima facie title, as people are fond of using that phrase, that this body of men had, was, when you look at the very papers themselves and the statute which was the sole authority for them to give serves and the statute which was the sole attendity for them to give certificates at all, was totally invalid. They may have been, as the Senator from Indiana says about their having been put in the State-house by the Army of the United States, the members of the Legislature; possibly they were elected; some of them undoubtedly were; but when you speak of their getting any evidence of their having been elected from the action of this returning board, then you say that by the judgment of this Senate you disregard the violation of the statute of the very State under which this board professed to act. I am not prepared to do that, sir.

And then we should be forced to inquire whether these gentlemen who did assemble in that place actually were elected. The committee who investigated that subject, in reference to the whole of that election, upon the very question of the election of Senators by that body, report to us that they were not. When I say "they were not," I mean a majority of them; I mean the bodies. Some of the individuals were elected and some of them were not. That they ought to have been elected; that they would have been elected if there could have been fair play and just dealing, the committee, or a majority of it, believe; but I repeat, I know of no warrant for me, as a judge under the constitution of this election-and I of course only speak for myself-to say that a body composed of persons who failed to be elected members of the Legislature in their respective localities, through fraud or violence or tumult or whatever, may elect a Senator of the United States to this Chamber. It is shocking to my sense of that duty under the law that we are bound to perform.

Mr. President, I only wish to add on this point—upon which I have perhaps spoken too long already—what appears from the report of every one of the members of this committee at the time it was made, including my honorable friend from Indiana. There is not a single member of this committee who even hints that this body of men was the member of this committee who even mints that this body of men was elected by the votes cast or offered at the election—not one of them. The pressure had not got strong enough. Of course I mean the pressure of those persuasive good reasons which lead judges to increase in the knowledge of the law in the study of a particular case. There was not one of them who, at the time when they made this report, had discovered that this body of men was the legislature by an election. My honorable friend from Indiana, whom I take as the highest type of a committeeman, who is endeavoring to reach justice without regard to any great technicality—and certainly it is a very desirable thing—you will find, when you read the views presented by himself as one of the minority of the committee, plants himself upon the fact that the supreme court of the State of Louisiana has decided that the Lynch board was the lawful board, and that this body of men was the lawful Legislature. That is his ground; and I am bound to say, with great respect to him, that that was the best ground that could be taken. The Senator from Indiana has put the case upon the strongest ground he can rest upon, as he almost always does cases that he presents. He could not reason out that this body of men had as a fact been actually elected at the polls. He could see from the evidence that there had been fraud and tumult and corruption and unfairness, which interfered with the free right of the people to elect. but he could not say that they did elect, for if they did there would be no material advantage gained to anybody in spending much time over the frauds, except as to punishment. But for the purposes we had in view it would be a sheer waste of time. But he does find that the supreme court of the State of Louisiana, as he thinks, has settled the question for him and for us; and, sheltering himself under the broad canopy of that decision, he says there is no difficulty in holding that this person is prima facie entitled to a seat. If we can shelter ourselves under that decision at all, there can be no difficulty in holding that he is not only prima facie entitled to his seat, but, as the resolution says, that he is absolutely entitled to it; for, if the judgment of the supreme court of the State of Louisiana binds us either as a matter of law or as a matter of confidence, considering the respectful attention that we ought to give to the decisions of the courts of the various States that we are called upon to review, there is nothing left of the case. There it is, because we certainly should not hold that these decisions of the courts are prima facie good, and that we are going to overrule them afterward. I never heard of a prima facie decision yet. We have got to take that for good, and all one way or the other, I suppose, to begin with.

Where do we find ourselves, then? We find ourselves confronted by what is called the decision of the supreme court of the State of Louisiana; and I will take it for granted, although there is a vast deal of circumlocution in these decisions, although there is a great deal of discussion of technical points, and very little discussion of the main point, that the supreme court of Louisiana did decide, and has decided again and again, if you please, that the Lynch board was the lawful board, and that this legislature was the lawful Legislature. Are we bound by that decision? If I correctly understand my honorable friend from Indiana, we are. He holds that we are bound to administer the law of the State; that it must be the law of the State which ascertains and determines who compose its political bodies, who form its government; and therefore, inasmuch as it is solely the law of the State, we are bound by the decision of the State tribunals as to what the law of that State is. That is the proposition. Is it sound? I do not think it is. The Constitution, which is the supreme law of the land, says that not the supreme court of Louisiana, not the supreme court of any State, but we, here, under a personal oath, each one of us, to do justice according to the law, shall be the judge for this purpose of what the law of the State of Louisiana is. Sir, I am not ready to abdicate; I have no right to abdicate. This provision of the Constitution making us the judge, first, last, and always, of the election of a Senator, was inserted from the gravest considerations, not only of public convenience, but of public safety. The fathers of the country in their wisdom did not intend that this Government should be broken down as so many of its predecessors had been by the factions and storms of localities in States; but to compose this national Government there should be this perpetual and supreme tribunal which was itself to be the judge of the election of its members; and nobody else was. It was not a concurrent jurisdiction; it was an exclusive one.

Therefore, Mr. President, while I agree that in a case of this kind we ought to treat with all the respect it deserves, and to give the greatest consideration to the judgments of the supreme court of the State of Louisiana of which they are capable in order to guide our minds upon our own responsibility to a true conclusion, we are not bound to follow them because they have said this to be the law. I cannot do better, perhaps, upon this subject, inasmuch as I am not altogether sure that every Senator who hears me will agree to my view of what our duty is, than read from the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, pronounced by Mr. Chief Justice Marshall in the celebrated case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, in the year 1824, on this very question to which I am now addressing myself:

The State of New York-

Says he-

maintains the constitutionality of these laws; and their Legislature, their council of revision, and their judges have repeatedly concurred in this opinion. It is supported by great names—by names which have all the titles to consideration that virtue, intelligence, and office can bestow. No tribunal can approach the decision of this question without feeling a just and real respect for that opinion which is sustained by such authority; but it is the province of this court, while it respects, not to bow to it implicitly; and the judges must exercise in the examination of the subject that understanding which Providence has bestowed upon them, with that independence which the people of the United States expect from this department of the Government.

I beg Senators to believe that what I have just read is the surest chart for republican liberty and for justice under the law. If the supreme court of the State of Louisiana had been composed of men of the highest fame and of the most spotless integrity, and possessed of the most far-reaching learning in jurisprudence, we should have respected their opinions; but we should have dishonored our Constitution and ourselves if we took those opinions to be the law of that State unless we believed it to be the law of that State in our own consciences and upon our own examination. I will not occupy your time, Mr. President, for the occasion is too broad for it, with any consideration of how far the judges of the court in question are entitled for their virtue, for their learning, or their intelligence, to the respect of this body. It would be an unpleasant subject to enter into, very unpleasant indeed, and out of the regard that I owe to the State of Louisiana, which in the long time past has had tribunals eminent in the respects of which the Chief Justice of the United States speaks, and in the long time to come will again, I hope, have similar ones, I think that we had better, as it regards the State judiciary of that State as well as it respects the Federal judiciary of that State at that time, pass over it in silence.

The question is, was the judgment of that court correct? My honorable friend from Indiana, strong again, as I say, in this report of his, in respect of the essential proposition which should guide us in reaching a conclusion in this case, puts himself upon the ground that that court has decided. He does not go into an examination and discussion of the subject for himself, but he takes it to be decided, and that is all. Here was a statute which confessedly by the laws and constitution of Louisiana could be approved by the governor in the vacation and after the adjournment of the Legislature, which in express terms repealed the former, laws upon the subject of the returns of elections, and provided a fresh method for performing those duties under the constitution related to the elections; and yet that supreme court say that that repealing act did not repeal. They do not give any reason for it except they say it would be inconvenient to have a change of officers (because that is what the substantial effect of the law was) before the old officers had performed all the duties which they would have been obliged to perform under the old law. Did you ever hear a weaker reason given for a legal decree than that? It is not worth discussing. If there is any Senator here who, if the supreme court had not decided, has any doubt in his own mind as to the law of November 20, 1872, if that was the date, having repealed the former laws, if he were to judge of it himself, it is perfectly useless for me to discuss the question here. There are no grounds upon which I could discuss it. There is the statute, constitutional, as this same court on all hands say it would be, in Louisiana, signed by the governor, which says that the old law is repealed, and yet the court say it is not.

What else have this court decided? They have decided, says my honorable friend from Indiana, that this Legislature was the lawful Legislature of the State. I deny it. The supreme court of the State of Louisiana have never attempted to decide, and never could at that time decide, hear, try, and determine what was the Legislature of the No such question during that period of time could by any possibility be heard in the supreme court of the State of Louisiana. decision of a cause or a question necessarily involves the right to decide it either way, of course; and it necessarily involves the idea that if decided either way the judgment is equally final and equally binding. That is the very fundamental feature of a judicial decision. Let us see what attitude that would place us in, and if the lawfulness of a legislative body while it is exercising its power, and de facto exercising the functions of government, can be drawn in question at all. Suppose the august tribunal that sits so near us in this Capitol should undertake to decide, in the sense in which I am now speaking of it as a subject of decision, that the House of Representatives and this body constituted the lawful Congress of the United States. Of course it would not be followed by any evil consequences; because we should be exactly what we were before; but having the matter before them for decision, which is the fundamental element of any decision at all, suppose they should happen to be of opinion the other way, and should solemnly decide that we are not the Senate, and that the House of Representatives over there is not the House of Representatives, what then? If there is a decision at all, as I have said, it is just as good in point of law whichever way it happens to go. The object of tribunals is to settle questions which are lawfully before them, and over which they have jurisdiction. Suppose the Supreme Court of the United States should decide that we are not the Senate and House of Representatives, do you think that would make any difference with us? It might make a very serious difference with them, but it would not make any difference with us; and this is so clear that I am wasting your time, and I must apologize for stating the simplest fundamental principles of jurisprudence. This is so clear, that even the supreme court of Louisiana did not doubt it; and instead of undertaking to decide and pronounce judgment upon that body of men as being a Legislature or not, they said, "We are bound to take notice of who constitute the political departments of this State; we cannot administer the laws otherwise." That was That was perfectly true; they were bound to take notice; and as things were then situated they were just as much bound to take notice (I do not know that every one will agree with me about that, but I feel clear about it) that that body of men was the Legislature of that State, as they were bound to take notice of anything, for the reason that at the time they pronounced these opinions that body of men was in complete possession of the legislative functions being exercised in that State. There they were, and they were exercising all the func-tions not only in name, but in fact, and with power, supported a lit-tle to be sure by the power of the Federal Government as they probably ought to be for purposes of peace, but not for purposes of right. That depends upon whether they are right; but for purposes of peace supported by the United States Government, they were exercising all the functions. Therefore it followed as a necessary consequence that in that place and at that time that court was bound to take notice that that body of men was the only Legislature there was in that State, or could be there. How would it be, supposing this body of men had happened to be composed of a majority of democrats, and supposing that in that court, as it is sometimes in senates, people's views are a little colored by their political predilections, and that court had said, "We do not recognize this body of men as the Legislature, we recognize the McEnery body," wherever that may be, what would have happened? Would that have determined which of those two bodies was the true Legislature? Would my honorable friend from Indiana have been bound by that? He would not, we would not; none of us would; and yet we should be just as much bound by it as we should by the recognition of the other; and what would have become of them? The court that did that would have destroyed itself by the very act, unless it could be supported by the strength of the McEnery legislature, and kept in its place. It would have severed that essential and necessary connection between the three departments of the government in a republic, the judicial, the executive, and the legislative branches. That government would have been broken down; and the court, of course, as it has no power like an executive to protect itself by force, would have disappeared from the face of the earth.

Thus it is clear that it does not help this question a particle, if we look at it with the eyes of justice and of law, as to the nature of that Legislature, that that court recognized it. It would not have helped it a particle if the Supreme Court of the United States sitting in that place at that time, or all the members of it, the best men in the land, had done exactly the same thing, because they could not do otherwise; and yet my honorable friend from Indiana maintains, if I correctly understand him, that that Legislature thus circumstanced becomes and is to be treated as competent under the Constitution of our country as a constitutional Legislature to supply members to this body, which belongs not to the State of Louisiana, but to all the people of the United States. It cannot be so.

My honorable friend has said that the function of a legislature is to make laws, and whoever therefore makes laws must be a legislature. I am speaking of bodies, of course; an emperor makes laws without any legislature. That does not follow; but suppose it did. Every one of the Confederate States of America, as they were called, every one of our unhappy sisters who went into the rebellion did not become disorganized as to themselves. They had laws, they enacted statutes, they held courts, they administered justice, which the Supreme Court of the United States has over and over again decided to have been perfectly valid; and yet I take it there is not a Senator here on either side of the Chamber who would have held that credentials coming from one of those legislatures at any time would have made even a prima facie case for a Senator to represent them in this body.

We unhappily are led into a fog at once in this matter by failing to observe the distinction between the exercise of a legislative power upon the people who are subject to it during a time of commotion or revolution or whatever you may call it, and the constitutional and rightful exercise of a power which they derive as the agents of the Constitution of the United States and of which we are to judge. There is the difference, and no man can put it out of sight. No human ingenuity can make out that the fact that this body of men exercised every function of a legislative body and that they were backed by a hundred thousand men to carry their statutes into force and that they were carried into force, advances you one single step in proving that that body of men has a right to participate in the government of Vermont and Ohio and Indiana by sending its representatives here to make laws for us. There is the misfortune. Treat this Legislature as recognized by its courts; it must have been as long as it bore sway; treat this Legislature as perfectly competent to pass laws as it has, as were the confederate legislatures; does that make out to you that a constitutional body of men under the Constitution of the United States did meet in January, 1873, and elect this man a Senator of the United States? That is the question. It is not a question of whether an act they have passed shall have force in Louisiana or not. It is a question simply and purely and fundamentally, whether that body of men came from the people in the forms that the securities for freedom have provided under the constitution of that State, and assembled in the time and in the way that the constitution prescribed, and having thus assembled, elected this Senator. That they did not do it is demonstrable from the report of my honorable friend from Indiana who puts himself, as I say, upon the strongest ground that he had, that we cannot look behind the supreme court of the State of Louisiana. There is the barrier that makes his defense.

of the State of Louisiana. There is the barrier that makes his defense. It has been said, Mr. President, (and I shall soon draw the little that I have to say at the present time to a close,) that the lapse of time has strengthened this man's case, as it is called; that events have accumulated one after the other in that State until finally they have culminated in such a set of things as to make these credentials and the case upon which they stand a constitutional case. Can that be so? If Mr. Pinchback was not constitutionally elected a Senator on the 16th of January, 1873, can you say that any events which have taken place since have made that election valid? If so, I suppose in another year or two, when the fortunes or misfortunes of politics shall put our friends on the other side of the Chamber into a majority, if we are to be distressed with that unhappy state of things, then the lapse of time will have been great enough to make the credentials of lapse of time will have been great enough to make the credentials of the McEnery legislature good; and on this authority it would be perfectly easy to turn the case over and say, We have been proceeding under a mistake all the time; it was not Pinchback, or if it was, the other credentials being still older now than his, as they have performed their office, McMillen has got the right; he is to fill the place, and Pinchback is to go out. And they could quote, as my friend from Indiana has quoted, a solemn decision of the supreme court of the State of Louisiana precisely in point to sustain them, for they have held, as between Pinchback as governor and Warmoth as governor and so on in that strange transmogrification that was going on there, that the last commission issued by Pinchback was prima facie much better than the first one.

No, Mr. President, I do not think we can find ourselves excused from facing this question in the very front by the idea that the lapse of time has healed its infirmities. If it had infirmities in January, of time has healed its infirmities. If it had infirmities in January, 1873, it has them still. The Constitution of the United States, the constitution of Louisiana and its laws, do not provide that Senators shall become Senators by lapse of time. They provide that they shall become Senators by a lawful election of a constitutional body, chosen by the people according to the forms of law. There is no other way, unless we cut a way by sheer force of will. We can do that of course. There is no other way of electing a Senator than that, and that way, according to the best light I can get, aided by the luminous reports of our friends of our own political faith, who have reported to us upon the subject, is to say that this election is fatally infirm in the fact that the body who undertook to perform it was not the body it pretended to be.

Something might be said (although in this body that always per-haps seems a little out of place) of the value of this precedent, if it is to be set one way or the other. I think I can safely say that it will be the first time in the history of this body when we shall have established a doctrine which the admission of this man inevitably implies, and that is that, if a majority of this body shall be satisfied that if the State election had been fairly conducted, and the returns fairly counted, and the officers fairly installed, there would have been or might have been a valid election of Senator, and thereupon we declare that that which ought to have been done be done and make him a Senator ourselves. Sir, the law as I read it has imposed no such duty upon me. It has given me no permission even to exercise a function of that character. The men who made our Constitution and laws, with that knowledge of history that they must have possessed, would have seen republic after republic, state after state, everywhere over the broad world where civilization led men to struggle for enlightened liberty, going to pieces one after the other until it comes to us from the sheer first fatal misstep of allowing the hope of consequences, the advantages of party, or the heats of faction to draw us away one hair from the fundamental letter of the Constitution and the law. If we give them up there is nothing to which we can fly; and so, as I have said, I think if it were a case of doubt that we ought to pause before we take what I regard as that sad first step in making Senators here, instead of deciding upon those who may present themselves under the constitutions of their States.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President—
Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Before the Senator goes on I simply wish to say that I desire to make a brief statement of the reasons for my I would as soon do it after the Senator from Indiana is through; but I thought that perhaps he preferred to close the debate.

matter of perfect indifference to me.

Mr. MORTON. I shall make a very brief reply to my friend from

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Very well.
Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont deprecates the introduction of any political consideration in this debate as alien to the true question here involved. I am glad to meet him on this ground, and I should have been very glad if the controversy had been conducted from the first on these principles; but I cannot doubt, admitting the entire integrity of the motive of my friend from Vermont, that this case from the first has been conducted upon political considerations in great part, and it does involve political considerations of the highest character. The personality of Mr. Pinchback has been lost sight of. This case has gone entirely beyond that; and I propose, before the case is finally decided, to treat of it in its political aspects and consequences, and I shall do it legitimately, fairly, and I trust fearlessly.

Mr. President, the admission of Mr. Pinchback to his seat has been fought with a pertinacity and with a bitterness wholly unknown in the history of this body from its first organization, and I assert here the listory of this body from its first organization, and I assert here to-day without the fear of successful contradiction that his exclusion is attempted by the violation of the fundamental principles of law governing the organization of this body, plain and palpable historic principles that we have recognized and that most of us here to-day have recognized. What has been the cause of this extraordinary bitterness? There is, I regret to say, some division in the ranks of the republican party here. There is no division on the other side of the Chamber. They see this thing all alike; they see it from one stand-point; and while I do not impugn the motives of any Senator—Inever do that—vet I must say that it is extraordinary that our friends. I never do that—yet I must say that it is extraordinary that our friends on one side of the Chamber should all see it alike if they looked at it from a legal stand-point.

Mr. President, the first thing to which I call the attention of the Senate is the fact that the distinguished Senator from Vermont has admitted by his argument, though not in direct terms, that Kellogg is governor of Louisiana. He has nowhere controverted that proposition, but has taken it for granted all through his argument. Therefore we start from this point: that Pinchback holds the certificate of the governor of the State of Louisiana, as much so as any Senator on this floor, myself and others. There is the starting-point in this argument: that Pinchback has the certificate of the governor of Louisiana. Now has he not a prima facie case as much as any Senator on this floor? How are the rest of us seated here, every man of us? seated upon the certificate of the governors of our States. The Senate has never stopped to inquire whether the Legislatures that elected us were the Legislatures of Iowa, Vermont, or Massachusetts; but that has been taken for granted in every case, because the governor of the State has certified that we were elected by the Legislatures of our respective States. His certificate makes out a prima facie case, not to be controverted until after we have taken our seats here. That is the law of our title; that is the tenure by which we hold here, every Senator of us. There have been some very strong illustrations of that doctrine.

Not only is that the law of our title to our seats here, but that is the law in the other end of the Capitol. Members take their seats upon the certificate of election of the governors of their States. If it is said they were not elected properly; if it is said they were chosen by fraud or corruption, the universal rule there, as it has been here, is that you cannot inquire into that matter until after the person has taken his seat and you get jurisdiction of him.

Now let me inquire about a recent case here. I take the case of Mr. Spencer, of Alabama, not yet three years old. I see Senators all around me who voted in that case. What was that case? Mr. SPENCER came here with the certificate of the governor of Alabama, just as Mr. Pinchback has done. He went up to be sworn in. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] objected to his taking the oath, upon the ground that there was a memorial here on the desk of the Senate showing that Mr. SPENCER was not elected by the Legislature of Alabama. We all remember what that memorial was. We all remember that the chief facts in that memorial were not in dis-What did that memorial set forth? That there were two legislatures or pretended legislatures in session in the State of Alabama: one called the capitol legislature, that assembled in the capitol building, the proper place to assemble; the other was what was called the court-house legislature, assembled in the court-house of the United States in Montgomery-not the ordinary place for the Legislature to assemble. This memorial set forth that Mr. Spencer was elected by what was called the court-house legislature, charging it to be a spurious legislature, and that the real Legislature of Alabama, assembled in the capitol building, elected Mr. Sykes. Before Mr. SPENCER took his seat the issue was made here on this memorial, and it was a notorious fact that there were two legislatures in the State of Alabama at that very time. What did we do? A motion was made, I believe by my friend from Delaware, to refer the credentials of Mr. Spencer to the committee, to examine the question before he took his seat whether he was elected by the Legislature of Alabama. That was the motion that was made. We debated it here Alabama. That was the motion that was made. We debated it here for three days. What was the ground taken by our democratic friends? That inasmuch as it was in dispute and was denied that Mr. SPENCER was elected by the Legislature of Alabama, that was the thing we must inquire into before he could take his seat. What did we say on the other side—my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] and all of us, every republican? We said that, as Mr. WADLEIGH] and all of us, every republican? We said that, as Mr. SPENCER had the certificate of the governor of the State of Alabama, he had a prima facie case; and whether he was elected by the Legislature of Alabama was a question that could not be inquired into until after he took his seat. We debated that point for three days, and when the vote was finally taken I believe every republican member of this body voted to seat Mr. Spencer on his prima facie case. Our democratic friends said that was no Legislature. They said, like the Senator from Vermont this afternoon, it was a mot; it was a fraud. We said, "Well, that may be the case; but you cannot inquire into it until Mr. SPENCER has taken his seat here." ordered him to be sworn in, in defiance of that objection. The Senator from Vermont was not in his seat on that day—he is noted as being absent—but I believe that Mr. Spencer received the vote of every republican Senator and was opposed by the vote of every democratic Senator on this floor.

Now it is proposed to trample upon that precedent. What is the difference between the cases of Spencer and Pinchback in principle? I am not speaking of the particular facts, but I am speaking of the principle, and I say there is but one difference, that the one was a white man and the other is a colored man, and you cannot make any other difference in principle, and that is no difference at all. The Legislature in each case was in dispute. It was a very nice question in the Spencer case. After SPENCER was seated, we examined into it. We were engaged in it a month, and we finally decided, after full examination and argument of counsel, that Mr. Spencer was elected by the Legislature of Alabama, although it had assembled in the court-house and not in the capitol of that State.

It is sought here to break down the rule that we adopted in the PENCER case. Why, what is the ulterior purpose; what is there SPENCER case.

behind all this, that we have got to trample upon our own action so recently adopted !

But, Mr. President, there is a case quite as strong as that from But, Air. President, there is a case quite as strong as that from Rhode Island, in 1833. What was that case? There was the old charter government in Rhode Island, and the Legislature of that State protracted its own existence one year, by a joint resolution. The life of that Legislature would have expired at a certain time. I believe on the 4th of March, 1833, in due course of law; but the Legislature by a joint resolution, extended its own existence twelve months. It was very doubtful whether it had the power to do so; the proposition looked absurd upon the face of it; but after the extension took place, and during this twelvemonth, the Legislature thus protracting its own existence elected a member of this body. Then that fall there was an election held by the people; a Legislature unquestionably legal was elected; no doubt about it at all; and that Legislature met the next winter, and elected another man a member of the Senate of the United States from Rhode Island, and both men came here. The man elected by the old Legislature filed his credentials first.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question, not to inter rupt his argument, but as a mere matter of information?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask whether these two Senators were persons of different political parties?

Mr. MORTON. I do not know whether they were or not, nor do I think that is very material.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not. I only thought that the precedent to which my friend refers would have a good deal more force if the sec-which my friend refers would have a good deal more force if the second person elected was of the same political party with the other.

Mr. MORTON. That may be; I do not know how that was; but I am speaking of the case because it is the strongest case that can be made. They both came here. When it was moved to seat Mr. Potter, elected by the old Legislature, objection was made that the question should first be examined which was the Legislature of Rhode Island, the old one or the new one. It was a very doubtful question. Mr. Clay, who was then a member of this body from Kentucky, took the ground that as Mr. Potter had the certificate of the governor of the ground that, as Mr. Potter had the certificate of the governor of Rhode Island, the first certificate, he had a prima facie title to the seat, and the question as to whether he was elected by the Legislature of Rhode Island could not be examined until afterward. The examination lasted some four or five months, and one of the ablest reports ever made by a committee of this body decided that the old Legislature was lawful, and Mr. Potter retained his seat. Now, to keep out Mr. Pinchback on his prima facie case, you have to trample down that precedent; you have to trample down the fundamental law of this body; and I ask why we are to do this violence? What is the object of it? Is it not more important to preserve the law of this body unbroken than to keep Mr. Pinchback out of his seat, whatever may be your personal objection to him?

Now take the case of Luther rs. Borden. In that case there were two governments in Rhode Island at the same time both trying to be recognized as the government of the State, the Dorr government and the old charter government. The supreme court of Rhode Island was not in dispute; both parties recognized that as the supreme court of Rhode Island, just like the supreme court of Louisiana. That is not in dispute. It was elected in 1868 and holds over. Everybody admits that the supreme court of Louisiana is the true and legal court of that State, just as in Rhode Island.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I do not disturb the Senator, as I do not wish to do, I would suggest to him that the distinction between the supreme court of Louisiana and the supreme court of Rhode Island at that time was this: The Rhode Island court was pronouncing its judgment after the Dorr legislature, or whatever you call it, was entirely gone; it was pronouncing upon a preceding state of facts and under and in accordance with an existing state of facts and a present legislature. lature. The supreme court of the State of Louisiana was acting in the presence of a co-ordinate power, and the only co-ordinate power that was then in existence.

Mr. MORTON. I think my friend is mistaken in regard to the facts. If he is not, still how does that alter the law? The question facts. If he is not, still how does that alter the law? The question was which government at the particular period was the government of Rhode Island, the Dorr government or the old charter government? The old supreme court of Rhode Island, not in dispute, decided that the control of Rhode Island, and the lawful government of Rhode Island. the charter government was the lawful government of Rhode Island. What did the Supreme Court of the United States say on that point?

The Supreme Court say, in the case of Luther vs. Borden:

The point, then, raised here has been already decided by the courts of Rhode Island. The question relates altogether to the constitution and laws of the State; and the well-settled rule in this court is that the courts of the United States adopt and follow the decisions of the State; that the courts of the United States adopt and follow the decisions of the State courts in questions which concern merely the constitution and laws of a State. Upon what ground could the circuit court of the United States, which tried this case, have departed from this rule and disregarded and overruled the decision of the courts of Rhode Island? Undoubtedly the courts of the United States have certain powers under the Constitution and laws of the United States which do not belong to the State courts. But the power of determining that a State government has been lawfully established, which the courts of the State disown and repudiate, is not one of them. Upon such a question the courts of the United States are bound to follow the decisions of the State tribunes, and must, therefore, regard the charter government as the lawful and established government during the time of this contest.

The supreme court of Louisiana has held, I believe on more than one occasion, that Kellogg was the lawful governor of that State.

It has taken notice, in the language of my friend, that the Legislature which elected Pinchback was the legislature of Louisiana, and has enforced its statutes and recognized its enactments as binding con-

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will pardon me, I think he is mis-taken in saying that the Supreme Court has held that Kellogg was the lawful executive. They have recognized him as the governor in the same way that they said that they were bound to recognize the Legislature—on exactly the same principle.

Mr. MORTON. If there be any valid distinction between that and recognizing, I fail to see it.

Mr. LOGAN. Allow me to make a statement. In the case of Luther vs. Borden the Supreme Court of the United States acknowledged the power of the Congress of the United States to recognize the government. The Congress of the United States has recognized Kellogg as the governor of Louisiana by different acts, by resolution of the Senate, and by recognizing the certificate in the House of members elected there.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that the act of Congress?

Mr. LOGAN. It is the act of both branches. It is not a joint resolution of both branches; but both branches have recognized the governor of that State by resolution on the last night of the last

Mr. MORTON. I might remark, as a circumstance not entirely unworthy of notice by our republican friends, that after a democratic House of Representatives has seated six members upon the certificate of Kellogg as giving to them a prima facie case, he being the governor of Louisiana, for a republican Senate to refuse to seat a republican Senator holding the same certificate may be thought to be a circumstance somewhat peculiar. The Supreme Court of Louisiana decided expressly on more than one occasion that what is known as the Lynch board was the lawful returning board of Louisiana; in other words, it has by its decisions covered the government of that State in every shape and form.

My friend asked whether Pinchback's case has been improved by lapse of time. I do not think it has; but I think it has not been injured by it in point of law or in point of justice. You take the compromise made in Louisiana, the general agreement down there, that the Kellogg government is the government of Louisiana. When that disputed point is settled, it relates back to the very beginning; it is an agreement that it is and was the government from the beginning, just like any lawsuit that may be in progress for years, even the case of Jarndyce vs. Jarndyce, when the question is decided the rights of the plaintiff are not fixed from the date of the decision, but are fixed from the beginning of the suit, or from the time that he claims his title. You may contest Pinchback's case from the beginning; you may contest it throughout his entire term; you do not thereby impair

Mr. President, I said there were political considerations in this case of the highest character, and so there are, and they touch the very merits of the case. I call the attention of my friend from Vermont to the history of this thing very briefly to-day, for I intend to speak more upon the political considerations hereafter. I call his attention to the fact that in 1872 there was a recognized and admitted republican majority in Louisiana of from sixteen thousand to twenty thousand. I call his attention to the fact that a conspiracy was formed, which has been proven, to overcome that majority by fraud and by violence; and the great question here to-day is, was that conspiracy a success? I say it was not a success; but the rejection of Pinchback is to declare in favor of the conspiracy and the success of the fraud. That is all it means. I bring it down to that. I believe Kellogg was elected. I believe a republican majority of the members of the Legislature were elected. I believe that the republican State officers were elected, that they had a majority of the votes in despite

But, Mr. President, the contest was not given up; violence was resorted to. Witness what took place at Colfax, one hundred men murdered in cold blood; the murders at Coushatta, the dropping murders from time to time; and finally, last spring, a compromise was made known as the Wheeler compromise. What was it? Some republican and democratic members of the other House went down there to investigate in regard to the condition of Louisiana. There was a contractive in regard to the resolution of the present house down there troversy in regard to the members of the present house down there. It was claimed that the returning board had excluded some democrats from their seats who had been elected, and a compromise was gotten up, which was expected to settle the whole Louisiana controversy and give peace to that State, by which the Kellogg government was to be recognized and established. The Wheeler adjustment was this, that they should admit certain persons to the house of representa-tives as having been elected, and stop there. The effect of that was to give the democrats a majority in the lower house. As soon as they got into power they violated the compromise. They then went to work and turned out enough republican members, in addition, to give work and turned out enough republican members, in addition, to give them a majority on joint ballot. I admit they had the power to do so, and we cannot go behind that. They got a majority in the lower house in the first place by a compromise. They then turned right around and violated that compromise and turned out enough to give them a majority on joint ballot; and then, after they had gotten a majority on joint ballot, they proceeded to elect a Senator to this body. They proposed to realize the fruit of this murder and violence and fraud beginning in 1872, ay, beginning back as far as 1866, for it is all one thing, it is all one continuous chapter. If we shall reject Mr. Pinchback, we thereby declare that there is a vacancy from the State of Louisiana. If there is a vacancy, the present Legislature has a right to fill it. We cannot keep that vacancy always. We cannot stultify ourselves because we have rejected Pinchback. Our democratic friends understand that full well. They are pressing to keep Pinchback out, and when we have declared a vacancy they will then insist on bringing in a democratic Senator, and thus realize the fruit of this terrible contest that has been going on for years.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator does not mean to say now that it would be clear that they have a right to do that before we inquire

Mr. MORTON. O well, I shall not now examine the question whether Mr. Eustis was elected strictly in conformity with law. I am referring to the broad question that if there was a vacancy in the Senate from the State of Louisiana, the present Legislature having been conceded to be a legal Legislature, have a right to fill it; and whether they have filled it by the election of Eustis or not, makes no difference. If they have not, they will by some one else either at this session or at the next.

I say then that the rejection of Pinchback is the consummation of this foul and bloody scheme from the beginning; and to bring that about—and I want the attention of my republican friends who propose to vote against Mr. Pinchback-to bring that about they must pose to vote against Mr. Pinchback—to bring that about they must trample on the well-recognized law of this body, they must refuse to apply to him the same rule that was applied to Spencer, that was applied to Potter, and that has been recognized as the law of this body from the time of its first organization. You have a right to do it if you want to. There is no power to prevent you from doing it. Ah, here comes back the old argument, the report; that the report of a committee appointed early in January, 1873, that concluded its examination I believe on the 20th day of that month; a committee before whom Pinchback's credentials were never naced until December.

before whom Pinchback's credentials were never placed until December 4, 1873, nearly one year afterward, nearly one year after all the evidence had been taken. Pinchback was not there to cross-examine the witnesses; he was not there to subpena witnesses; he was not there to defend his case; but the extraordinary argument is made here that he is to be bound by an ex parte examination to which he was not a party; where he had no rights; could not examine, or cross-examine, or subpena—a report made nearly a year before the time when his credentials were submitted to the committee; and the presumptions growing out of that report are to overcome the fundamental law in regard to a prima facie case! As a mere question of law, I say, with all respect to my learned friends, it seems to me to be a most transparent absurdity. The fundamental law is that, having the certificate of the governor, he has got a prima facie case, and whether he was elected by fraud, or whether he was elected by the proper I exist a prima facie case, and the inquired into until effect he has whether he was elected by fraud, or whether he was elected by the proper Legislature or not, cannot be inquired into until after he has taken his seat. You allow it in all other cases. You refuse it to Pinchback. If you can satisfy the people of this country that this inconsistency is just and proper, I think you will have an arduous task. The recent history of Louisiana, in the violation of the Wheeler compromise and in the declarations of the State democratic convention recently, shows that the democracy of Louisiana, the white-line democracy of Louisiana, keep no faith and do not pretend to keep faith with the republicans there or throughout the country. They have recently attempted to destroy Kellogg and impeach him upon frivolous grounds. We know what they are doing in Mississippi and we know what they intend to do throughout the South. The question is, are we bound to give them aid and comfort?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I propose to vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, and very briefly and informally to state the reasons of my vote. I am constrained to make this statement of my views because the Senator from Ohio [Mr. President, I propose to vote against the amendment of first order to be senator from Ohio [Mr. President, I proposed to the statement of my views because the Senator from Ohio [Mr. President, I proposed to the statement of my views because the Senator from Ohio [Mr. President, I proposed to the statement of my views because the Senator from Ohio [Mr. President, I president, I president, I president in the statement of my views because the Senator from Ohio [Mr. President, I president, I president, I proposed to vote against the amendment of the statement of my views because the Senator from Ohio [Mr. President, I president, I proposed to vote against the amendment of the statement of my views because the Senator from Ohio [Mr. President, I president, I proposed to vote against the amendment of the statement of my views because the Senator from Ohio [Mr. President, I preside THURMAN] some days since called the attention of the Senate to the votes of Senators, and I was among them, who some two years since voted in favor of a new election in Louisiana. I believe that on the voted in favor of a new election in Louisiana. I believe that on the report of the committee I did vote for another election.

The election of 1872 was certainly irregular and accompanied by much fraud, and I would have been glad that the subject should have been referred immediately back to the people; but the Senator from Ohio and his party associates refused to give the opportunity. They compelled us to consider the case as we have it here, and thus drove me to an examination of the case and of the evidence; and I have reached the conclusion that Mr. Kellogg received a majority of the votes cast at that election. Having arrived at that conclusion it votes east at that election. Having arrived at that conclusion, it seems to me that the Constitution and the laws require us to seat Mr. Pinchback. On looking at the Constitution it appears that each State is entitled to two Senators; that is, each State that is in friendly relations with the national Government, while the converse is true as to the case supposed by the Senator from Vermont of States while in rebellion. I find, too, by turning to the laws, that it is pre-

That it shall be the duty of the governor of the State from which any Senator shall have been chosen as aforesaid, to certify his election, under the scal of the State, to the President of the Senate of the United States, which certificate shall be countersigned by the secretary of state of the State.

I find here the formal certificate that Mr. Pinchback was elected Senator and attached to it the great seal of Louisiana. I find, too, that, although we have waited two or three years, no one else has any other certificate. The only question then for us to determine is whether the governor of Louisiana signed that certificate. If he did, Mr. Pinch-The only question then for us to determine is whether the back has a title to a seathere; I do not say it is a prima facie; I attach to it no adjective; he has title in the same manner that we have title to our seats. The resolution too is right in form. By that certificate Mr. Pinchback has title for six years, as we have for our terms. His, as ours, is a title nisi; it is a title unless something be shown to invalidate it, something to contradict his muniment of title, which is the certificate, and whenever that contradiction comes, whether after one year or five years, his title will be set aside.

The only question in my mind, therefore, is whether Mr. Kellogg was when the certificate was given governor of Louisiana. What is there that militates against his so being? There is nothing, excepting the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and they must pardon me in saying that that report came to the only conclusion which could not possibly be correct. There was an election on the 4th of November, 1872, with all the prescribed forms, and either McEnery or Kellogg was elected or there was a tie; and that committee find that there was no tie and that neither one was elected. That report is all there is against Kellogg having been duly elected governor.

What is the affirmative proof that he was governor? Sir, we cannot dispute the fact, when the Senate has by resolution declared that William P. Kellogg is the executive of the existing government of Louisiana. We cannot say that the resolution meant that he was only governor de facto. No, Mr. President; if we say a man is governor, we mean just that. If we intended that he was in a qualified sense governor, as governor de facto, we would say so. The Senate, when they use terms, use them artistically; and, in declaring that William Pitt Kellogg was the executive of Louisiana, we declare that he is so de jurc. Besides this, the supreme court of Louisiana has recognized him as governor; the President of the United States and the House of Representatives have so recognized him. For three years he has performed the duties and exercised the functions of governor; both parties, republican and democratic, have so recognized him; he is today being proceeded against as governor by articles of impeachment. We cannot say that he is not governor; it is impossible. But I have no purpose to establish that Kellogg is governor by the use of an estoppel. Very briefly let us look at the case as an original one.

Warmoth was elected a republican. It is notorious that he made a bargain to carry the State over to the democracy, and he was to be rewarded by a seat here. He had the intent to commit a fraud. That is not disputed. You will see by looking through the testimony that the election was not characterized by violence of any kind. It was a quiet, peaceful election. Warmoth had the intent to perpetrate a fraud in the returns from the different parishes in the State. He approach the commit and the intent to perpetrate a fraud in the returns from the different parishes in the State. pointed Blanchard registrar; Blanchard appointed the supervisor in every county or parish; the supervisor appointed the three commissioners, to whom was added three freeholders to assist in counting the votes. Warmoth had the intent, and he also had the power to perpetrate a fraud in the returns. He had all the machinery in his hands. He had both the purpose and the power to make a fraudulent return in favor of McEnery. Kellogg had no more power to control those returns than I had.

Again, Warmoth having the control of the returns, the ballots and the poll-lists, it was at any hour in his power to have called twenty honest men, one-half of each party, into the State-house and say, "Here, let us see whether McEnery is or is not elected. Here are the returns." If some one said, "Your returns are false," he would reply, "Here are the ballots to sustain those returns." If some one said, "Your ballot-boxes have been stuffed or votes have been abstracted," he "Your ballot-boxes have been stuffed or votes have been abstracted," he would reply, "Here are the poll-lists corresponding with the ballots." If some one said, "Your poll-lists have been tampered with in such a precinct," he would respond, "Every voter in that precinct has his registration papers, upon which it is indorsed whether he voted. Now send your officer to that precinct; let those who voted swear how they voted." And thus he could have demonstrated, were such the fact, that McEnery was elected governor. Sir, Warmoth knew that McEnery was not elected or he would thus have proven that he was. It is irresistible moral evidence; for, instead of resorting to the proof which he possessed, he came here and asked that the election might be set aside and a new one ordered.

Mr. President, it is said that McEnery was elected by 9,606 votes. Mr. President, it is said that McEnery was elected by 9,606 votes. There are four parishes, Madison, Grant, Pointe Coupée, and East Baton Rouge, where it appears by the testimony that the returns were forged. The Forman board give Kellogg 1,222 majority in those four parishes; the Lynch board give Kellogg 3,969, or 2,747 more votes than are allowed by the forged certificates. There are also six parishes which the Forman board did not count at all in comalso six parishes which the Forman board did not count at all in coming to the result that McEnery had 9,606 majority. They cast them out on the allegation that there was violence, and the testimony shows none. The parishes are Iberia, Iberville, Saint James, Saint Martin, Saint Tammany, and Terre Bonne. Those six excluded parishes gave Kellogg a majority of 3,327. Thus these ten parishes, the four and the six, give Kellogg a majority of 6,060, reducing McEnery's majority down to 3,546. And what are we to do with this majority of 3,546? If any one will take this testimony and run over a few of the parishes he will see how that majority for McEnery was manufactured. Let me call attention to two or three of the counties or parishes.

is Caddo parish. It had a white registration of 1,549 voters. The McEnery vote was 1,837, or 300 more than the white registration. the same parish the colored registration was 3,139, and the Kellogg vote was only 1,579, or 1,560 less than the registration. The white vote was 300 more; the colored vote nearly 1,600 less than the registration! Showing fraud after the election, for keeping voters from the polls would not make McEnery's vote more than the registration.

Take again the parish of Rapides. The white registry was 1,719; Take again the parish of Rapides. The white registry was 1,719; the McEnery vote was 1,900, the McEnery vote being 249 more than the registration. In Nachitoches Parish the white registry was 1,517, and the McEnery vote 1,230; the colored registration 1,833, and the Kellogg vote but 550, or 1,283 less than the registry. In Bossier Parish the white registry was 587, and McEnery's vote 953, or 366 more than the registration. The colored registration was 1,795, and the Kellogg vote but 5658 are 1,240 less than the registration. than the registration. The colored registration was 1,795, and the Kellogg vote 558, or 1,240 less than the registration. So you may run through these returns in the different parishes, and you will find in many cases the McEnery vote exceeded the white registry and the Kellogg vote very much less than the colored registry; and we must not forget that the report of the majority of the committee tells us that the whites voted the democratic ticket and the colored people the republican ticket.

One other consideration and I am through, and it seems to me to settle this question. In the ten parishes alluded to we have been obliged to rely somewhat on the returns of the Lynch board, but not so in the view I now present. In twenty-four parishes there is but little difference between the Lynch board and the Forman board, and the vote of the two parties is very close. The Forman board makes the democratic vote 36,679, and that same board makes the republican vote 36,203, claiming only a democratic majority of 476. In twenty-four parishes all that the Forman board claimed was a democratic majority of 476. The Lynch board claim rising a thousand republican majority.

The democracy must make up their 9,606 majority in the remaining thirty-four parishes, for there are only fifty-eight parishes in the State. Now I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the white registration in those thirty-four parishes was 34,786, and the colored registration in those thirty-four parishes was 42,879. The colored people wation in those thirty-four parishes was 42,879. The colored people were republicans, the white people were democrats; and yet they claim that while the white registration was but 34,786 and the colored registration 42,879, McEnery had 9,606 majority. The thing is absurd upon the face of it. The Forman board claim that this 34,786 white registry gave McEnery 27,788 democratic votes, and that the 42,879 colored registry gave for Kallogg only 21,720 monthlians. 42,879 colored registry gave for Kellogg only 21,170 republican votes. Apply the same ratio to the colored registration that you do to the white registration, and instead of the republican vote being 20,170, it would be 35,000, giving Kellogg for governor a large majority.

Mr. President, I am satisfied that Kellogg had a majority of the votes cast; that Mr. Pinchback has the governor's certificate; that there is no other certificate; and that Louisiana is entitled to another Senator; and on that certificate I propose to vote that Louisiana shall have the Senator required by the Constitution of the United States.

It is urged that the Legislature that elected Mr. Pinchback was not the true Legislature of the State. It is admitted that the courts of the State have adjudicated it to be the true Legislature. It is, how-ever, correctly said that we are not bound by the decisions of any court, State or Federal. It is also properly admitted that we may look beyond the formal returns and certificates, and get at the facts.

But certainly we must have something to act upon.

I have given the reasons why I think Keliogg was elected, and I insist that all the probabilities are that the Legislature that was elected was in political harmony with the governor who was elected. The body that elected Mr. Pinchback has been adjudicated by the State courts to be the true Legislature, and as such it has enacted laws. The certificate of one who was governor de jure, as we cannot deny, informs us that it was the true Legislature. We have nothing to base a judgment upon that it is not the true Legislature. We have nothing to rest such a judgment upon, except that the forms of law have not been observed, and it is very fairly admitted that we are not bound or restricted by those forms. There is nothing upon which we can rest a decision that the certificate of the acknowledged governor is false and the judgment of the State court erroneous. What proof have we? What proof have we to overcome the governor's certificate and the adjudication of the courts of that State? I agree that we are not bound by either certificate or adjudication; that we are judges ourselves; but we must have something to judge upon, and in the absence of all proof that it is not the true Legislature, seeing it clear that the governor was elected, we cannot say that the certificate is false and the adjudication of the State courts of Louisiana is erroneous.

These are my reasons in brief, Mr. President, for the votes I propose

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I desire briefly to lay before the Senate

my views upon the question under consideration.

When I entered upon my duties here as a Senator from Mississippi, the question had ceased to be novel, and had already been elaborately and exhaustively discussed. So far as opportunity has permitted me to do so, I have dispassionately examined the question in the light of this discussion, and I venture my views now with the diffidence inspired by my limited experience in the consideration of such questions and by a just appreciation of the learning and ability of the gentlemen who have already attempted to elucidate and determine

I believe, Mr. President, whatever seeming informalities may attach to the manner in which the will of the people was ascertained, that Mr. Pinchback is the representative of a majority of the legal voters of Louisiana, and entitled to a seat in the Senate. In the election of 1872, the white population of the State exceeded, by the census of 1872, the colored population by about two thousand, including in the white estimate 63,000 foreigners, only half of whom were naturalized. This estimate, at the same ratio in each race, would give a large majority of colored voters. The census and registration up to 1872 substantially agree, and both sustain this conclusion. The census of 1875, taken in pursuance of an article of the State constitution, gives, after including the foreign population (naturalized and unnaturalized) in the white aggregate, a majority of 45,695 colored population.

This view of the question is submitted, not as determining the contest, but as an offset to the allegation that Mr. Pinchback does not fairly represent the popular will of the State, and as a presumption in favor of the legal title of the assembly that elected him.

The State government elected in 1872, and permanently inaugurated in January, 1873, in the face of contest and opposition, obtained for its authority the recognition of the inferior and supreme courts of the State. When organized violence threatened its existence and the United States Government was appealed to for troops to sustain it, the national Executive, in pursuance of his constitutional authority and duty, responded to the demand made for help, prefacing said action by an authoritative declaration, made through the Attorney-General, addressed to Lieutenant-Governor Pinchback, then acting governor, of date of December 12, 1872, that said Pinchback was recognized as the lawful executive of Louisiana, and the body assembled at Mechanics' Institute as the lawful Legislature of the State;" and similar recognition of his successor was subsequently When, in September, 1874, an attempt was made to overthrow given. When, in September, 1874, an attempt was made to overthrow this government, the President again interposed with the Army and Navy for its protection and the maintenance of its authority.

This government has proceeded to enact and enforce laws for more than three years which not only affect life, liberty, and property, but which have received the general obedience of the citizens of the The present government also has frequently been brought in official contact with the United States Congress—through its Legislatures of 1873 and 1875, by memorials and joint resolutions addressed to the respective Houses; and through its executive, by credentials, borne by Congressmen and by Senators—and in no case has the legiti-mate authority of the Legislature been excepted to save in its action of electing a United States Senator; and in no instance has the sufficiency of the executive's credentials been questioned, in either House, except in the matter of the senatorial claimant.

Now, sir, shall we admit by our action on this case that for three years the State of Louisiana has not had a lawful Legislature; that its laws have been made by an unauthorized mob; that the President of the United States, actively, and Congress, by non-action at least, have sustained and perpetuated this abnormal, illegal, wrongful condition of things, thereby justifying and provoking the indignant and violent protests of one portion of the people of that State, and inviting them to renewed and continued agitation and violence? Such action by us would be unjust to the claimant, a great wrong to the people who sent him here, and cruel even to that class who have awaited an opportunity to bring to their support the overwhelming moral power of the nation in the pursuit of their illusion—which has so nearly ruined the future of that fair State—a government based upon the prejudices of caste.

I respectfully ask the attention of Senators to another view of this subject, which is not without weight in determining the obligations of this body to the State of Louisiana and in ascertaining the title of the claimant. If the assumption that the present government, in-augurated in 1873, is without legal authority and a usurpation is true, the remedy for this state of things was to be found in the exercise by Congress through the joint action of the two Houses of the powers conferred under the guaranteeing clause of the Constitution relative to republican forms of government in the several States.

Failing to exercise her power and perform her duty in this direction, and thus practically perpetuating the present government, I submit that, in my judgment, we cannot now ignore our obligation to give the State her full representation on the score of the alleged irregularity of the government through which she has expressed her will; and there does seem to me, in this connection, something incongruous in the proposition that we may impose upon the people a government without legal sanction and demand their obedience to and support thereof, said government meanwhile determining the character of its successors and thus perpetuating its taint, and yet are powerless to admit a Senator elected thereby.

In my judgment, this question should at this juncture be considered and decided not on abstract but practical grounds. Whatever wrongs may have been done or mistakes made in Louisiana by either party the present order of things is accepted by the people of the State and by the nation, and will be maintained as a final settlement of the political issues that have divided the people there; and no changes in the administration of public affairs can or will be made, except by the people, through the ballot, under the existing government and laws of the Commonwealth.

Under these circumstances, holding this question in abeyance, is, in my judgment, an unconstitutional deprivation of the right of a State, and a provocation to popular disquiet; and, in the interest of good-will and good government, the most judicious and consistent course is to admit the claimant to his seat.

I desire, Mr. President, to make a personal reference to the claimant. I would not attempt one nor deem one proper were it not that his personal character has been assailed.

As a father, I know him to be affectionate and worthy; as a husband, the idol of a pleasant home, and cheerful fireside; as a citizen, loyal, brave, and true. And in his character and success we behold an admirable illustration of the excellence of our republican institutions. Mr. CHRISTIANCY obtained the floor.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY obtained the hoor.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Will the Senator from Michigan yield to me to make a motion to go into executive session?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend from Pennsylvania will yield to me a moment, I desire, if it is the pleasure of the Senate now, to take up the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New York, not to delay his motion at all, but with a view to leaving it as the unfinished business on Monday morning, so that I may occupy the attention of the Senate for awhile on Monday rather than at some other time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sure we will give the Senator unanimous consent to speak in the morning hour on Monday morning, if he wishes to speak then.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose the morning hour will not be long enough for my purpose; and I prefer to speak on Monday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sure we will extend the time if necessary.

I am certain there will be no difficulty in extending the time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; with that understanding I will not press it now

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 30,

Mr. MORTON. Before the doors are closed I desire to withdraw the motion to reconsider the vote to adjourn over until Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the motion to reconsider is withdrawn.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate thereupon proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened; and (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 3, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

TESTIMONY IN THE CASE OF GENERAL SCHENCK.

Mr. SWANN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be, and they are hereby, authorized to print from time to time such testimony bearing upon the investigation now going on in that committee in relation to the case of General Schenck, our minister at the Court of St. James, as may be deemed proper in the judgment of said committee.

KANSAS PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas, by unanimous consent, presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas; which was ordered to be printed:

Kansas; which was ordered to be printed:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 2, relating to lands of the Kansas Pacific Railway Company, and the right to tax the same.

Whereas the Kansas Pacific Railway Company, holding lands in the State of Kansas, have thus far failed to perfect the title to a large portion of their lands within the limits of said State, whereby such lands are, by decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, exempt from taxation; and whereas, said company has been liberally endowed, both by the bonds of the United States and a valuable landed domain, and, while they have regarded their title to said lands as sufficient to execute a mortgage thereon, to make contracts for conveyances of the same, and, in cases of waste or trespass committed upon such lands, to enjoy in the courts of this State the same protection that is given to its citizens; and whereas the claims of equity and justice alike demand that these lands should bear their just proportion of the public burden and be subject to the same laws which govern the subject of taxation as other property of a like character is subject in the State of Kansas; and whereas this just regulation is sought to be defeated by the continued neglect of the said railroad company to perfect its title to the same by paying to the United States a nominal sum of money to liquidate certain costs of survey and conveyance, as provided by the terms of the several acts of Congress, making the grants of land referred to: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the senate of the State of Kansas, (the house of representatives concurring.) That the Congress of the United States is hereby requested to pass, as speedily as possible, a law providing that the neglect of the said Kansas Pacific Railway Company or the parties in interest to pay the costs of survey and conveyance, as aforesald, shall not prevent the legal title to said lands vesting in said company or party in interest, subject to the payment of such costs; and the said lands shall be subject to all legal taxes imposed under the authority of this State from the time such company or party in interest shall have been or may be entitled to conveyance thereof, the same as though no costs or fees had been imposed by the act by which such grant was made, and the acts amendatory thereto.

*Resolved**. That the secretary of state be requested to send one copy of this resolution to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, one copy to the President of the Senate, and one copy to each of our Senators and Representatives in Concress.

MARY CAIN.

Mr. STONE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2453) for the relief of Mary Cain, of Saint Louis, Missouri; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SETTLERS ON THE PUBLIC LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. BROWN, of Kansas, by unanimous consent, presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, memorializing Congress in behalf of certain citizens, settlers upon the public lands.

Mr. BROWN, of Kansas. I ask that the memorial be printed; and

I do so because the Committee on Public Lands have already passed upon the question, and it will be of some importance that the House shall see the facts of the case. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The resolution is as follows:

House concurrent resolution No. 22, memorializing Congress in behalf of certain citizens, settlers upon the public lands.

citizens, settlers upon the public lands.

Whereas certain citizens of the State of Kansas have, in good faith, settled upon public lands within the State of Kansas, which lands were open to settlement under the homestead act of May 20, 1862, and June 21, 1866; and whereas said settlers did make homestead entries in compliance with the provisions of the above-named homestead acts; and whereas said lands are claimed by certain railway companies; we believe that a presentation of the facts will enable Congress to pass such enabling act or acts as are necessary to secure to said settlers titles to their lands and to compensate said railway companies for any losses they may sustain by reason of such act or acts. To that end a copy of the homestead papers in the case of Hiram Watts are inserted herein, the facts contained in which present the situation of hundreds of others.

RECEIVER'S OFFICE Topeka, Kansas, March 18, 1869.

Receiver's receipt, No. 1831. Application No. 1831.

Received of Hiram Watts the sum of $12.59, being the amount of fee and compensation of register and receiver for the entry of the south half of southwest quarter of lot 4 of section 30, in township 22 of range 22, under the acts of Congress approved May 20, 1862, and March 21, 1864, entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain.

[Proof required under homestead acts, May 20, 1862, and June 21, 1866.]

We, J. E. Wishard and Moses Jones, do solemnly swear that we have known Hiram Watts for seven years last past; that he is the head of a family consisting of a wife and one child, and is a citizen of the United States; that he is an inhabitant of the south half of the southwest quarter of lot No. 4 of section 30, in township 23 of range 22, and that no other person resided upon the said land entitled to the right of homestead or pre-emption; that the said Hiram Watts entered upon and made settlement on said land on the 2d day of June, 1868, and has built a house thereon of logs. It is nineteen feet long and seventeen feet wide, shingle roof, two doors, two windows, lumber floors, one and a half stories high, and is a comfortable house to live in, and he has lived in the said house and made it his exclusive home from the 10th day of July, 1868, to the present time, having lived in a temporary shanty on said land from the 2d day of June, 1868, to said date, and that he has, since said settlement, plowed, fenced, and cultivated about fifty-one acres of said land, and has made the following improvements thereon, to wit: He has built a board stable, covered with hay, and a gramary of boards, and has planted an orchard of four hundred apple, peach, and cherry trees, and one hundred and eighty appletrees in nursery, and one hundred and ninety rods of hedge fence, and has dug and walled two wells, and has planted about one thousand forest trees.

Mr. HARDENBERGH also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1231) for the relief of the board of trustees of the Antietam National Cemetery, with an amendment and the recommendation that the bill as amended be passed.

The bill was read. It provides that, for the purpose of discharging the balance of the indebtedness incurred by the board of trustees of the Autietam National Cemetery in establishing the same and improving the grounds thereof and the proper burial therein of the soldiers who fell on the battle-field of Antietam, there be appropriated the sum of $15,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in the liquidation of such indebtedness; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to hereafter provide for the preservation and superintendence of the said cemetery as one of the national cemeteries of the United States under the laws now in force in regard to such national cemeteries

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Add to the bill the following proviso: Provided. That the said sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to discharge the present existing indebtedness, shall not be paid until the legal title to said property shall be vested in the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the amendment will be read again. I did not exactly eatch its import, but I think it is right.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the amendment is right, and I have no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed

Mr. HARDENBERGH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

tucky, known as the Newport Barracks.

The bill and amendments were read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose there is a report accompanying this bill.

I therefore suggest that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and that the report be printed.

Mr. TERRY. I did not deem it necessary to make a written report in this case, but I will ask the Clerk to read the reply of the Secretary' of War to the inquiry of the committee as to the propriety of the passage of this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise the point of order that this bill should have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole. There are a great many cases of the same kind.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HOSKINS.) The Chair would ask

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HOSKINS.) The Chair would ask if the bill makes an appropriation of money?

Mr. TERRY. It makes no appropriation.

Mr. RUSK. It makes an appropriation of property.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is it an appropriation of public property or of any property belonging to the Government now?

Mr. TERRY. It is simply a relinquishment by the Government of certain property.

certain property.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Indiana insists upon his point of order, the Chair will rule upon it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to suspend the point of order until these gentlemen can be heard, but there are a multitude of these cases, and I think it is well that we should consider them carefully.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar and the report ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Does the Chair decide that this is an appropriation of money or land?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is an appropriation of property belonging to the United States to other parties.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. It is only a relinquishment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the point of order well taken, and the bill has been referred to the Committee of the

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, rose

Mr. BRIGHT. I rise to a question of order. I believe that this is private bill day—objection day—and that that business takes precedence in point of order over any other matters.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. Hoskins.) This being Friday, and objection day, the question of consideration may be raised be-tween the business on the Private Calendar and the special order on which the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] is entitled to the That gentleman, as the Chair understands, desires to raise the question of consideration. The first question put to the House will be upon the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Bright,] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. Should that motion fail, the question will recur upon the motion of the gentleman from New York, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the bill to carry out the Hawaiian treaty.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. It will be observed that I have the floor in pursuance of the order of the House making the bill which I had the heavest a received results of the latest the latest the state of the latest the lates the honor to report a special order; and while I do not wish to in-terfere with the private bills in the Committee of the Whole, I hope the House will resume the consideration of the treaty question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understood the gentleman from New York, but this being objection day in the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar takes precedence of a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, even though there may be a special order in that committee. If, however, the House is determined not to go into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, then it will be competent on the gentleman's motion for the House to resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to take up the special order in that committee.

Mr. BRIGHT. I will say that inasmuch as the gentleman from New York has commenced a speech in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in reference to the Hawaiian treaty, which has not been finished, I have no objection to going into the Commit-tee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in order that he may finish his speech, and then when he has finished it I shall insist on my motion to go into the Committee of the Whole to take up the Private Calendar, as this under the rule is objection day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That cannot be done, unless the gentleman can get the floor to move that the committee rise and go back into the House, when it will be in order to move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BRIGHT. That being the case, I insist on my motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT,] chairman of the Committee of Claims, this being objection day, moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the Chair rules that that motion takes precedence and will have first to be submitted to the House.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 96, noes 41.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BRIGHT, and Mr. WOOD of New York, were appointed.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 96, noes 55.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, Mr. Beebe in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. This being objection day, the Clerk will proceed to call the Private Calendar at the point where the call ended on the last objection day.

Mr. BUCKNER. But what becomes of the bills which were objected to last Friday, and which still remain upon the Calendar?

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair has already stated, the call now begins where it left off on the last objection day; and when the Calendar has been gone through with the call will begin with the beginning of the Calendar, and under the rules it will then take the objection of five members to prevent a bill being laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass. The committee is now proceeding upon the first call of the Calendar, when a single objection will prevent a bill being laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HERMANN KREISMANN.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1988) for the relief of Hermann Kreismann, United States consul-general at Berlin.

The bill, which was read, directs the proper accounting-officer to credit Hermann Kreismann, United States consul-general at Berlin, in his account, with the sum of $397.72, being in full for consular funds stolen from the consulate on the 13th day of February, 1873, without fault or neglect on the part of said consul.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

It appears from the report that the claim is made on account of a loss alleged to have been sustained by said Kreismann on the 13th day of February, 1873, by a larceny supposed to have been committed by one Schimmrick, employed as porter in and about the said consu-late. Proceedings were commenced in the criminal court of the city of Berlin by said consul, and warrant issued for the apprehension of the robber, and the testimony taken in the case. An authentic transcript thereof, together with the affidavit of the said Kreismann, having been submitted as proofs in the case, the committee find the following facts to be well substantiated: That the robbery was committed by which $397.72 in gold and currency, which had been received by said consul as fees, together with private funds, jewelry, and clothing belonging to said Kreismann and his wife, to the value of several bundred dollars were feloniously taken from the apartments several hundred dollars, were feloniously taken from the apartments of the said consul, and that no part thereof was ever recovered. It also appears from the correspondence between the Secretary of State and said consul-general that no suitable safe had been furnished by this Government in which the consular funds could have been kept; but that such a safe has since been furnished by order of the Secretary of State, thereby obviating in a great measure such danger in the future. The committee are of the opinion that the loss in this case did not happen from lack of care on the part of said Kreismann. would, therefore, report the accompanying bill, and recommend the same do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS VAN DUZEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. The black business on the Fivate Calcular was the bill (H. R. No. 1025) for the relief of Thomas Van Duzen and his assigns, for lands. The bill, which was read, provides that the title to said northeast quarter of section 36, township 29, Washington Territory, be, and the same is hereby, confirmed unto the said Thomas Van Duzen, his heirs and assigns, in fee-simple.

and assigns, in fee-simple.

It appears from the report, which was read, that—
First. By the organic act of Washington Territory, approved March 2, 1853, the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of every township were reserved for common-school purposes. (See Revision, section 1947.)
Second. By an act of the territorial Legislature, approved January 23, 1863, the county commissioners of certain counties (among which was Jefferson County, in which the land described in the bill is located) were authorized to sell these lands for a sum not less than $1.50 per acre, the money to go into the school fund of the county. The per acre, the money to go into the school fund of the county. The sale was only, however, to be of such lands as had been settled upon under the donation or pre-emption laws before the survey of the same, and were in the actual possession of settlers at the time of the pas-and were in the actual possession of settlers at the time of the passage of the last-named act.

Third. Thomas Van Duzen, the grantee in the bill, was such settler under the pre-emption laws, and he accordingly, at the November term of the county commissioners' court, held at Port Townsend, in the county of Jefferson, on the 2d day of November, 1863, made proof of settlement on the northeast quarter of section 36, township 29 north, range I west, before the survey of the same, and made then and there application for the purchase of the same; and upon the payment of $1.50 per acre, gold coin, a deed was duly made and delivered to him by said commissioners' court. The deed is dated February 3, 1864, at a regular term of said court. a regular term of said court.

Fourth. The land was subsequently mortgaged by said Van Duzen to secure the payment of $1,846 to S. M. Noland, sold on said mortgage after a foreclosure, and purchased by said S. M. Noland.

Fifth. S. M. Noland has spent large sums of money in improving the same, and it is now worth $10,000. Noland has no title whatever.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill, believing it simply an act of justice to the parties interested.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ROSETTA HERT, CHARLES C. BENOIST, AND OTHERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No.

534) for the relief of Rosetta Hert, (late Rosetta Scoville,) Charles C.

Benoist, and Logan Fanfan, half-breed Indians.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury and Department of the Interior to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mrs. Rosetta Hert, (late Rosetta Scoville,) Charles C. Benoist, Emily Benoist, and Logan Fanfan, each the sum of $204.38, as their distributive shares of the moneys arising from the sale of the lands known as the Nemaha half-breed reserve, on the Missouri River, in Nebraska.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HEIRS OF WILLIAM STEVENS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 719) for the relief of the heirs of William Stevens.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the heirs of William Stevens to enter at the United States land office at Sioux Falls, Dakota Territory, the southeast quarter of section No. 16, in township No. 101, in range 49, upon the payment of $1.25 per acre therefor; and when said entry shall have been made and returned to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, a patent shall issue therefor as in other cases of pre-emption entries.

It appears from the report, which was read, that William Stevens, in about the month of August, A. D. 1858, took up and settled upon a tract of land in Dakota Territory, being the same land described in the said bill, and that the land in the vicinity, including the said tract, was not at that time surveyed, but was surveyed in the following year, (1859.)

Soon after the survey the said Stevens, in order to secure his right, filed a notice of his claim with the surveyor-general, (Hill, since dead,) and paid him the fees, and was told by the surveyor-general that it was all right. In the course of the fall of 1858 he built upon the said tract of land a small stone house, in which he resided, and soon after a log stable, and fenced and cultivated about five acres of land, and continued to live in the house and to make it his exclusive home until the autumn of 1862, when the Sioux Indians attacked the settlement and drove all the settlers away. Continued hostilities with the Indians prevented the settlers from returning until 1867. In January, 1867, the land in question, under order of the President, was included in the reservation of Fort Dakota, and continued so reserved till June 10, 1869. In the spring of 1869 Stevens returned and took possession of said land, repaired the house, put in a crop upon the five acres previously cultivated, and continued to live in the house until the autumn of that year, till within a few days of his death in Navarahar, 1869 having hear proposed to a reighborie the house until the attumn or that year, till within a few days of his death, in November, 1869, having been removed to a neighbor's shortly before his death for better care. The land in question was not open for entry or purchase under the pre-emption or homestead laws until July, 1870; eight months after the death of said Stevens. The land in question is one-fourth of section 16, which is designated and appropriated for school purposes, but the other three-fourths of the section have been already purchased of the Government, and other land must be or has been substituted therefor for schools.

As to citizenship and occupancy or ownership of other land under

As to citizenship and occupancy or ownership of other land under the pre-emption laws or otherwise in any State or Territory, the said Stevens in all things conformed to the requirement of laws.

Upon proof of the foregoing facts, in the fall of 1873 or beginning of 1874, application was made on behalf of said Stevens's heirs at the district land office for permission to purchase the land in question under the pre-emption laws, but said application, on being referred to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, was refused by the Commissioner on the ground that said Stevens had not filed a declaratory statement as required by law, and that the statement alleged to have been filed with the surveyor-general was not authorized by law.

The township plats of survey were filed in the district land office July 16, 1862. By act of May 30, 1862, the claimant had three months from the date of filing the plats to file his declaratory statement. But Stevens had filed his statement with the surveyor-general in 1859, and, whether legal or not, it is fairly to be presumed, from the fact that he thought it sufficient and all that was necessary.

It does not appear that there are any intervening rights or conflicting claims that can or could be affected by the failure of said Stevens to file the formal declaratory statement required by the

From all the evidence before them the committee conclude, as mattroin an the evidence before them the committee conclude, as matter of fact, that said Stevens did go upon and improve said land and continue and follow up the possession and occupancy of the same, with the bona fide intention of obtaining a title for the same under the pre-emption laws, and to appropriate it to his own exclusive use and benefit; and further, that the equities of the case entitle the claimants to the privilege of purchasing the said tract as provided in the said bill the said bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the joint resolution (H. R. No. 64) granting the rights and benefits of the Soldiers' Home to John News

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs that the commis sioners of the Soldiers' Home be, and they are thereby, authorized an directed to admit John News to the rights and benefits of said Soldiers' Home; provided that it shall satisfactorily appear to said commissioners that said News has not incurred any of the disqualifications named in section 4822 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The report states that it appears from the records of the War Department that said News served in the United States Army for four-teen years, in four several enlistments, commencing August 12, 1851, and was discharged by the War Department, at his own request, August 12, 1874. It also appears from the records of the Navy Department that said News served in the United States Marine Corps eight years, in two enlistments of four years each, making his whole period of service in the Army and Navy about twenty-two years.

By the act of March 3, 1851, an honest and faithful service of twenty years in the Army is made a preliminary condition of admission into the Soldiers' Home. The committee believe that equitably the case of this old soldier, who served in the two branches of service twenty-two years, comes within the liberal spirit and intent of this law, and is entitled to the benefits of the Soldiers' Home. They therefore unanimously recommend the passage of the accompanying joint resolution.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. C. THRUSH AND W. B. STONE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 732) for the relief of Mrs. Catherine Thrush and William B. Stone, owners of the schooner Flight, with an amendment by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Catherine Thrush, widow, and William B. Stone, owners of the schooner Flight, of the city of Baltimore, Maryland, the sum of $4,000, which shall be in full compensation and damages for the loss of the schooner Flight, sunk in the Chesapeake Bay, October 8, 1873, by a collision with the United States Steamer Tallapoosa.

The arrendment of the committee was read as follows:

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

In line 7 strike out "$4,000" and insert "$3,000."

Mr. O'BRIEN. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read as follows:

The report was read as follows:

On the 8th day of October, 1873, the steamer Tallapoosa, soon after entering the mouth of the Potomac River, saw a vessel's light bearing one point on the starboard bow. The steamer kept on her course, rendering her liable to run across the course and path of the vessel whose light they saw, bound down the bay. It was blowing fresh. The schooner changed her course to go down the bay, and was occupied in reducing sail and changing over her main-boom, and, being short-handed, the steamer was lost sight of by those on board the schooner. Those on the steamer saw the schooner all the time, but did not sound the whistle nor give any alarm, but when across the track indicated by the course of the schooner she stopped. The captain of the schooner on again sighting the steamer, no alarm being given, supposed, as he had a right to do, that she was proceeding under usual steam. But as the steamer did not go ahead, a collision was inevitable before the captain of the schooner could change his course to clear the steamer, that lay like a log across his path. It seems that the steamer did nothing from the time she saw the schooner until the collision but stop in her path, instead of considering all the circumstances and pursuing a course that would have insured safety, which she might have done by keeping the schooner one point on the port bow instead of one point on the starboard bow when she first saw her; then the collision would not have occurred; and the schooner ther and there sunk. In consideration of the facts and conditions here reported, we recommend that the bill accompanying this do pass.

The ameudment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to. There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House. ROBERT CAVANAUGH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1499) granting a pension to Mrs. Lydia Johnson, of De Witt County, Illinois

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Lydia Johnson, of De Witt County, Illinois.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the report may be read. The bill is manifestly defective.

The report was read, as follows:

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1499) granting a pension to Lydia Johnson, mother of Joel Johnson, late a private soldier of Company I, Forty-seventh Regiment Illinois Infantry Volunteers, ask leave to submit the following report:

The committee have carefully examined all the evidence on file, and find that the soldier was enrolled as a private soldier in said company and regiment; that he was wounded in battle at Drury's Bluff, May 14, 1864, and died of said wound in June, 1864; that the soldier left the said Lydia Johnson, his mother, and Kenneth Johnson, his father; that the father has not been able to support his family since 1855, either from infirmities or laziness; that the mother yas old, infirm, and poor, and, except the small amount of her own earnings, was dependent upon the labor of her son, the said Joel Johnson, for support; that, in fact, her said son supported the family by his labor before entering the service, and sent her money, while in the Army, for her support.

This is the evidence of the family physician, the first lieutenant of the son's company, and numerous other credible witnesses. It is true the case was prejudiced by the dishonesty of the attorney who first prepared the case, but the evidence shows that he was convicted and punished, and that she was in no way a party to or concerned in the dishonest practices of her attorney.

The committee are unanimous in the opinion that the evidence conclusively establishes her right to a pension, and therefore report back said bill No. 1499, and recommend its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. The rank and company and regiment of the sol-

Mr. HOLMAN. The rank and company and regiment of the soldier are not stated in the bill. It would be impossible without the statement of rank to fix the pension.

Mr. JENKS. To meet the objection of the gentleman from Indiana I offer the following amendment:

After the word "Johnson" insert the words "mother of Joel Johnson, late a private soldier of Company I, Forty-seventh Regiment Illinois Volunteers.

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MARY P. ABEEL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1992) granting an additional pension to Mary P. Abeel.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary P. Abeel, widow of James S. Abeel, late ordnance storekeeper in the United States Army, and pay her a pension of $20 per month as though the said James S. Abeel had held the rank of captain in the Army of the United States; the act to take effect from its passage, and the pension hereby granted to be in lieu of that which she is now receiving.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

WILLIAM H. H. ANDERSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 258) granting a pension to William H. H. Anderson.

The bill was read. It instructs and requires the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of William H. H. Anderson, late a private of Company B, First Indiana Heavy Artillery Volunteers, on the pension-rolls of the United States at the rate of $8 per month from and after the passage of this act.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

JOHN E. WUNDERLIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 183) granting an increase of pension to John E. Wunderlin, late a private in the Thirty-third Regiment of New York Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-rolls the name of John E. Wunderlin, late a private in the Thirty-third Regiment of New York Volunteer Infantry, at the rate of $24 per month, said pension to be in lieu of that now drawn by said John E. Wunderlin.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON, JULY 9, 1842.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 186) to provide for compensation to the owners of certain lands ceded by the United States to Great Britain in and by the treaty of Washington of July 9, 1842.

The bill was read.
Mr. HOLMAN. This bill has been frequently before Congress and will require explanation before it can pass. I object.

LEWIS GOODWIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2160) for the relief of Lewis Goodwin, late keeper of the light-vessel at Brant Island Shoals, in the State of North Carolina.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the proper accountingofficers of the Treasury to adjust and settle the account of Lewis Goodwin, late keeper of the light-vessel at Brant Island Shoal, in the State of North Carolina, and allow him the amount, if any, for his services there from the 1st day of January, 1861, to the 1st day of April, 1861; and a sufficient sum is hereby appropriated for that purpose out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated by law.
The report was read, as follows:

The report was read, as follows:

That it appears from the records of the Treasury Department that the claimant, Lewis Goodwin, was employed as a seaman of the Wolf Trap light-vessel, up to December 31, 1860, at the rate of $18 per month. That there is no record of any pay having been made to the claimant after December 31, 1860.

But it does not appear, except from the affidavit of the claimant, what amount of service was rendered by the said claimant subsequent to December 31, 1860, for which no payment was made.

The committee, believing it to be equitable and just that the claimant be paid for whatever services he so rendered, do herewith report the accompanying bill for his relief, and recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

JAMES A. JACKSON AND OTHERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 545) for the relief of James A. Jackson and others, securities of G. R. Horton, late postmaster at Monticello, Arkansas, with an amendment.

The bill was read. It provides that James A. Jackson, John Hussy, Eli Rogers, Iverson L. Brooks, and William F. Slemons, securities of George R. Horton, late postmaster at Monticello, Arkansas, be released from all liability as such securities on account of post-office money, stamps, and money-order funds stolen from said office on the fall to fthe said securities or the said postmaster.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads was to insert "$1,078.48" after the words "sum of."

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred House bill
No. 545, for the relief of James A. Jackson and others, have had the same under consideration, and find that, on the night of the 6th of June, 1874, G. R. Horton, postmaster at Monticello, while going from the office to his home, and about eleven o'clock at night, was set upon by three masked men, gagged and taken some distance from the road and tied to a tree, the keys of the office and safe taken from him, and that some hours afterward he succeeded in arousing some of his neighbors, who liberated and went with him to the office, which was found open, as also the safe, in which were contained the moneys belonging to the Post-Office Department, the money-order department, and stamps, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $1,078.48, without any negligence or fault of the said securities or the said postmaster. They therefore report the said bill back and recommend its passage.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

SAMUEL RHEA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 912) to give the Court of Claims jurisdiction to hear and determine the claim of the heirs of Samuel Rhea.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported back the bill with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the substitute alone will be read.

There was no objection, and the substitute was read. It authorizes the Court of Claims to investigate the claim of the legal representatives of Samuel Rhea for the net proceeds of cotton owned jointly by the said Rhea and one John H. Fain; and, if said court shall be satisfied, from the evidence of the ownership of the said Rhea in said cotton, that the same was seized and sold and the proceeds thereof have been paid into the Treasury of the United States, to award to his said legal representatives the net proceeds thereof as determined by the said court in the case of John H. Fain, heretofore determined in said court; and the evidence heretofore taken in the said suit of John H. Fain may be offered by either party.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. Samuel Rhea, in his life-time, early in the year 1862, jointly with one John H. Fain, purchased a lot of cotton through the agency of one A. I. Ainsley. The whole purchase amounted to $12,509.80. Of this amount Rhea furnished $7,499.80 and Fain furnished $5,010. The whole amount of cotton purchased was two hundred and fifty-one bales. The parties all resided in Georgia, and was, in the fall f1862, shipped to, and received by, one R. J. Loury, in Atlanta, Georgia. Twentyfive bales were sold by Loury, in November, 1863, to pay taxes, storage, &c.; one hundred and twenty-five bales were shipped by Loury to Macon, Georgia, and form no part of this claim; forty-three bales were burned in the warehouse at Atlanta, Georgia, during the shelling by General Sherman's forces, and form no part of this claim:

numbred and twenty-five bales were shipped by Loury to Macon, Georgia, and form no part of this claim: forty-three bales were burned in the warehouse at Atlanta, Georgia, during the shelling by General Sherman's forces, and form no part of this claim.

The remainder, being fifty-eight bales, remained in Atlanta, and was taken possession of by the United States forces, and forwarded to Cincinnati and sold, and the net proceeds, amounting to $20,873, have been paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. Samuel Rhea died in May, 1863, long before the cotton had been seized.

The act of Congress approved March 12, 1863, provides as follows: "And any person claiming to have been the owner of any such abandoned or captured property may at any time, within two years after the suppression of the rebellion, prefer his claim to the proceeds thereof in the Court of Claims; and on proof, to the satisfaction of said court, of his ownership of said property, of his right to the proceeds thereof, and that he has never given any aid or comfort to the present rebellion, to receive the residue of such proceeds, after the deduction of any purchase money which may have been paid, together with the expense of transportation and sale of said property, and any other lawful expenses attending the disposition thereof."

This act, and all of those amendatory of it, will be found at length in the appendix to the rules of the Court of Claims. The construction placed upon these by the Supreme Court of the United States may be succinctly stated as follows:

First. This was not a confiscation act, but was intended to preserve and take care of the property and the fund arising from its sale for whomever it might concern. Second. The United States acquired no right or title to the cotton or the fund by virtue of the seizure and sale, and the title of the owner was not divested.

Third. The property was held for such proceedings as the executive arm of the Government might direct against it. If it wished to acquire a title, it must have p end.

Fifth. Therefore, the Government, as to this fund, was a trustee; was a trustee from the beginning for those who never aided the rebellion, and as to all others it became a trustee from the time they received pardon and amnesty. These principles are elaborated in the following cases:

United States vs. Padleford, 9 Wallace, page 537; United States vs. Klein, 13 Wallace, page 136; Armstrong vs. United States, 13 Wallace, page 155; United States vs. Carlisle. 16 Wallace, page 147.

Mr. John H. Fain commenced his suit in the Court of Claims within the time limited by the statute. As his ownership had been joint with Mr. Samuel Rhea, a full investigation was had of all the facts relating to the whole lot of fifty-eight bales of cotton. The testimony was all taken under the rules of the Court of Claims, which require a notice to the Attorney-General; and the Government appeared, by its attorney, and cross-examined the witness; and, after full argument in open court, upon testimony thus taken, the case was declared in Fain's favor, and he was awarded $3,360 as his share of the proceeds of the fifty-eight bales. The case is reported at length in the fourth volume of Court of Claims Reports, (Nott and Huntingdon,) page 237.

length in the fourth volume of Court of Claims Reports, (Nott and Huntingdon,) page 237.

Hon. Robert S. Hale, of New York, appeared and defended for the Government, and the defendant took no appeal from the decision. All of the facts material to this ease have been adjudicated in the ease of John H. Fain vs. The United States. The heirs of Samuel Rhea failed to bring suit within the time limited in the act of March 12, 1863, but it is submitted that, as the United States hold this money as trustee for them without a shadow of right or title to it, it is not consistent with the principles of equity or justice to retain it because of a technical advantage.

The Government is never bound by a statute of limitations, and, excepting in the Court of Claims, it has never sought to avail itself of such statutes. No claim before a Department of the Government or before Congress is met with such an objection.

The limitation in this case was a sharp one. The two years following the close of the rebellion were years of confusion in the South. Nearly all of the heirs were either minors, married women, or absent from the country when Mr. Rhea died. In all other statutes of limitations the rights of such parties are saved, but this act makes no exceptions.

The substitute was agreed to; and there being no objection, the

The substitute was agreed to; and there being no objection, the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

MRS. SARAH SPAULDING.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 566) granting relief to Mrs. Sarah Spaulding, of Bay City, Michigan, with an amendment.

The bill was read. It provides that there be paid to Mrs. Sarah Spaulding, of Bay City, Michigan, widow of the late Lovel F. Spaulding, out of any moneys in the Treasury, $1,000, as compensation for materials used and work done in making improvements on homestead-entry No. 340, made upon the South Charity Island, section 6, town-ship 18 north, of range 9 east, in the State of Michigan; said homestead entry having been canceled.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands was to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$500."

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF SAINT ALBANS, VERMONT,

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 58) to pay the First National Bank of Saint Albaus, Vermont, the value of certain United States Treasury notes held by said bank as financial agent of the United States and forcibly taken therefrom by raiders from Canada in October, 1864.

The bill was read.

Mr. COX. I think that bill ought to be discussed. I object.

PAYMENT OF CLAIMS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1218) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported to Congress under section 2 of the act approved June 16, 1874, by the Congress under section 2 of the act approved June 16, 16/4, by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Clerk commenced the reading of the bill.

Mr. EDEN. This bill consists of nineteen pages. If the committee have power to dispense with the further reading, I make that motion. There being no objection, the further reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. EDEN. I submit the following amendment:

At the end of line 10 in the printed bill add the following:
And embraced in the schedule of claims reported by the Secretary of the Treasury at the commencement of the second session of the Forty-third Congress.

The amendment was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the bill, as amended, being

Mr. KEHR. I object.

Mr. EDEN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. There are a number of matters in the bill to be inquired into. I think it should not be reported without an opportunity to debate. tunity to debate.

Mr. KEHR. I insist on my objection.

R. H. BUCKNER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2161) for the relief of R. H. Buckner.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Richard H. Buckner, a citizen of Virginia, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,470.83, said amount being the proceeds of certain real estate of said Buckner sold for taxes by the Government of the United States in Backner sold for taxes by the Government of the United States in February, 1854, less the amount of tax, penalty, interest, and costs; provided that before said payment is made the said Richard H. Buckner, or his legal representatives, shall make and execute a valid quitclaim and deed of conveyance of all the right, title, claim, or interest of said Buckner to said property to and in favor of the purchaser of said property at said tax sale, her heirs and assigns, without interest. There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF SAMUEL WARE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 97) directing the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue certificates of relocation for six hundred and forty acres of land in Missouri to the legal representatives of Samuel Ware, with an amendment.

The preamble recites that Samuel Ware was the owner of landclaim No. 433, located in the county of New Madrid, in the then Territory of Missouri, for six hundred and sixty arpents, which was confirmed by act of Congress of the 29th day of April, 1816, (United States Statutes, volume 3, page 328;) and that, said lands having been injured by earthquakes, the said Samuel Ware availed himself of the provisions of the act of the 17th day of February, 1815, (Statutes, volume 3, page 211,) whereby persons owning lands in said county of New Madrid which were materially injured by earthquakes were authorized to locate the like quantity of lands on any of the then were authorized to locate the like quantity of lands on any of the then Territory the sale of which is authorized by law; and that in pur-suance of said law said Ware relinquished his claim to the land confirmed as No. 438, under the act of the 29th day of April, 1816, and applied for a certificate of relocation; and that on the 16th day of August, 1816, Frederick Bates, recorder of land titles, did issue to said Samuel Ware certificate of location No. 63, which was afterward located on the east half of section 12, township 24 north, of range 17 east, and the west half of section 7, township 24 north, of range 18 east, on Wolf Island, in the Mississippi River, upon the supposition that said island was in the State of Missouri, and that it has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States (11 Wallace, page 395) that said island belonged to the State of Kentucky.

The bill therefore requires the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue a certificate of new location to the said Samuel Ware, or his legal representatives, authorizing them to locate said certificate on six hundred and forty acres of any land in what was Missouri Terri-

The amendment reported by the Committee on Private Land Claims was to strike out the words "said Samuel Ware or his legal representatives" and to insert the words "legal representatives of Samuel

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to strike out the preamble of the bill. The question being taken, the motion to strike out the preamble was not agreed to.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

KLAMATH INDIAN RESERVATION, OREGON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1316) to adjust the claims of the owners of lands within the limits of the Klamath Indian reservation in the State of Oregon.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to issue scrip to the legal owners of the land granted to the State of Oregon by act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, to aid in the construction of a wagon-road from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of the State, authorizing them to select and locate, of the unoccupied and unappropriated public lands of the United States, not mineral, and in tracts not less than the subdivision provided for in the United States land laws, and, if unsurveyed when taken, then to conform when surveyed to the general system of the United States land surveys, a quantity of land equal in amount to the lands within the limits of said grant embraced in the Klamath Indian reservation, designated said grant embraced in the Klamath Indian reservation, designated and set apart by the Commissioner of the General Land Office as lands in place, and likewise any indemnity lands within the limits of said reservation that have been selected and approved to the State of Oregon under the provisions of said act; the quantity of said lands to be ascertained by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. And the said Commissioner shall issue patents for the lands so selected, provided that no scrip nor patents shall issue as hereinbefore provided until the owners of the lands embraced in said reservation shall execute and deliver to the Commissioner of the General Land Office a cute and deliver to the Commissioner of the General Land Office a deed conveying to the United States all their right, title, and interest to the same

The question first recurred on the following amendment:

Provided further, That no scrip issued in pursuance of the provisions of this act shall be located upon other than the public lands lying within the said State of Oregon.

The amendment was adopted.

There being no objection, the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES SINCLAIR, DECEASED.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 225) granting six hundred and forty acres of land to the widow and heirs of James Sinclair, deceased.

The bill, which was read, provides that the tract of land known as the military timber reservation in Walla Walla County, Washington Territory, containing six hundred and forty-one and sixty-four hun-dredths acres, situate partly in township 7 north, of range 36 east, and partly in township 7 north, of range 37 east, of the Willamette meripartly in township 7 north, of range 57 east, of the Willamette merdian, be, and the same is thereby, granted as follows: The west half of the said tract to Mary Sinclair, widow of James Sinclair, deceased, and the east half to said Mary Sinclair and the heirs of the said James Sinclair, deceased. And it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, by and through the proper United States land office in Washington Territory, to cause the said tract of land to be surveyed, and to issue a patent therefor to the said widow and heirs of James Sinclair, deceased, in accordance with the provisions of this act and of the act of Congress anywayed the 27th day of Senof this act and of the act of Congress approved the 27th day of September, 1850, entitled "An act to create the office of surveyor-general of the public lands in Oregon, and to provide for the survey, and make donations to settlers of the public lands."

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. JENKS. I move that the committee rise and report the bills which have been laid aside.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. Hoskins having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. Beebe reported that the Committee of the Whole House had, according to order, had the Private Calendar under consideration, and had directed him to report to the House sundry bills and joint resolutions, with the recommendation that they do pass, some with and some without amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bills which have been reported with amendments will be first acted on.

There was no objection.

BILLS PASSED WITH AMENDMENTS.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar to the following bills were severally agreed to, and the bills, as amended, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the A bill (H. R. No. 732) for the relief of Mrs. Catharine Thrush and William B. Stone, owners of the schooner Flight;

A bill (H. R. No. 1493) granting a pension to Mrs. Lydia Johnson, lery, (colored;) and A bill (H. R. No. 2307) granting a pension to Mary Bell Decker.

HEIRS OF SAMUEL RHEA.

The question next recurred on the bill (H. R. No. 912) to give the Court of Claims jurisdiction to hear and determine the claim of the heirs of Samuel Rhea, reported from the Committee of the Whole House with an amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. My impression is that was not directed to be reported to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No objection was made to it, and the question now is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand it was objected to in committee and upon this ground, that but two facts are referred to the Court of Claims. This is for abandoned cotton; and two questions are referred to the Court of Claims: one is as to the ownership of the cotton, and the other as to the heirship. The question of loyalty is not presented by the bill at all. My understanding is that it was objected to on that ground; nothing was said on that point, but that was the motive for the objection. Under the law a person is required to establish loyalty in order to be entitled to the proceeds which have been covered into the Treasury of cotton sold by the Government. Here in this bill loyalty is not required to be established by the ancestor through whom the claim is made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will say there is no record at the Clerk's desk of any objection having been made to this bill being reported to the House, and it is now too late to make such objections.

Mr. COX. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that he move to recommit this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to recommit this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF SAMUEL WARE,

The question next recurred on the bill (H. R. No. 97) directing the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue certificates of relocation for six hundred and forty acres of land in Missouri to the legal representatives of Samuel Ware, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar with an amendment.

The amendment of the committee was concurred in.

Mr. DUNNELL. The preamble to this bill covers two pages, while Mr. DUNNELL. The preamble to this bill covers two pages, while the bill takes up only two or three lines. I ask by unanimous consent that the preamble be stricken out.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. I object.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

KLAMATH INDIAN RESERVATION, OREGON.

The question next recurred on the bill (H. R. No. 1316) to adjust the claims of the owners of lands within the limits of the Klamath Indian reservation in the State of Oregon, reported from the Committee of the Whole House with an amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to make an inquiry in regard to this bill of any gentleman who is acquainted with the facts in the case. I understand from the report that the road provided for has been constructed to this reservation, but I do not understand whether or not patents have been issued for the lands in conformity to the grant made by Congress.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I understand that patents have issued. There is no dispute as to the title and there has been none. I will call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the letter of Ex-Commissioner Smith. He recommends the passage of this bill.

This is a question of equity and justice. The lands were granted by the Government to the State of Oregon for the construction of this road. The road was built and received by the Government. The lands were listed. Since then the Government has made a treaty with these Klamath Indians to locate their reservation upon these same lands. The owners have been meanwhile paying taxes to the State of Oregon for a number of years, and yet the Government now takes possession again.

Mr. HOLMAN. One other inquiry. If I understand my friend from California correctly the grant of lands was made to the State of Oregon, and the State of Oregon gave these lands to a corporation?

Mr. LUTTRELL. In alternate sections for the construction of this road.

Mr. HOLMAN. Have patents been issued for these lands?
Mr. LUTTRELL. Yes, sir.
Mr. HOLMAN. Now, does this bill provide that these lands shall be reconveyed to the Government?

Mr. LUTTRELL. Yes, sir; and that the owners take lands elsewhere in the State of Oregon; unoccupied lands. It is simply an ex-

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the bill will be reported again, that that Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the bill will be reported again, that that may appear.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The whole bill or the amendment? Mr. HOLMAN. The bill as it stands amended.

The bill as proposed to be amended was read.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I would like to ask the member of the committee who reported this bill if there is any particular force in the words "unoccupied and unappropriated?" In former special and private bills we have used the word "unoffered;" also in another act the words "unoccupied," "surveyed" or "unsurveyed." Those words gave special privileges to such scrip. On the "Valentine scrip," so called, three pieces were located on part of the city of Chicago, the claim being that it was unoccupied and unsurveyed land; and in that way lands have been appropriated worth perhaps millions of dollars. I do not know that there is any partiular force in those words. I have not examined the subject. I do not know but they are the usual words. I would like, however, an explanation.

Mr. LANE. This bill provides, as proposed to be amended, that the scrip shall be located only upon public lands situated within the limits of the State of Oregon.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I understand that that is provided for in the amendment.

Mr. LANE. And certainly it can only be located on such lands as would be subject to entry in the State of Oregon under existing law.

The bill would not affect any vested rights.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. If the gentleman from Oregon is satisfied I am content, as it is all in his State.

Mr. LANE. I am quite satisfied.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time,

SESSION OF SATURDAY.

Mr. SAYLER. I rise to a question of privilege. I move that when

Mr. RANDALL. I hope not. I desire to state that the considera-tion of the Hawaiian treaty is the next business in order. There are at least fifteen gentlemen who have indicated their intention to speak on that subject. Behind that is the deficiency bill reported from the Committee on Appropriations in reference to printing the currency.

I feel it my duty to object to an adjournment over until Monday.

Mr. 8AYLER. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. SAYLER. I ask unanimous consent to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I have made the motion in the interest of the business of the House and of the committees of the House Labora convolted with a number of chainsan of committees of the House. I have consulted with a number of chairmen of committees, and they agree with me in the propriety of the motion I have submit ted. So far as regards my own committee, that on the public lands, I may say that the call rests with us; and it is of very great importance that the committee should have at least one more meeting before it is again called in the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

The question being taken on Mr. Sayler's motion, there were-ayes 86, noes 40.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for the yeas and nays. But before insisting on the yeas and nays being ordered, I would suggest that we have a session to-morrow for debate on the Hawaiian treaty only, no other business to be transacted.

Mr. SAYLER. I have no objection to that. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will make a motion that the session to-morrow shall be for the purpose of the consideration of the Hawaiian treaty alone—merely for continuing debate on that subject—I have no objection.

Mr. RUSK. I call for the regular order.

Mr. SAYLER. I withdraw the motion to adjourn over.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will submit the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that there be a session to-more for the consideration of the Hawaiian treaty alone for debate. row for the consideration of the Hawaiian treaty alone, for debate only, and no vote to be taken thereon.

The proposition was agreed to.

JEFFERSON BOWERS.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1588) granting an additional pension to Jefferson Bowers, of Mason County, Illinois.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment:

Amend by adding to the last line of the bill the words "according to his present disability."

There was no objection, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

HEIRS OF SAMUEL RHEA.

Mr. HOLMAN. I moved the reference of a bill for the relief of the heirs of Samuel Rhea to the Committee of the Whole on the Prithe neirs of Samuel Khea to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. I am now led to believe, after speaking with my colleague, [Mr. Baker, of Indiana,] that the seizure of this cotton occurred after the close of the war; so that the principle I spoke of does not apply. I move a reconsideration, so that my colleague may offer an amendment. The bill is House bill No. 912, to give the Court of Claims jurisdiction to hear and determine the claim of the heirs of Samuel Rhea.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk, and wish to say a few words in explanation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first question will be upon the motion to commit the bill to the committee to which it it was referred. Pending that question, the gentleman asks unanimous consent that the amendment which will now be read be incorporated in the bill. It is an amendment to the substitute for the bill.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Amend line 8 by striking out the following words, namely: "that the same was seized and sold," and inserting in lieu thereof the following, namely: "that the same was unlawfully seized and sold, in violation of the laws and regulations of the Government then in force.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire to say one word of explanation in reference to that amendment. As the bill now stands it simply requires that the Court of Claims be satisfied by proof of the existence of three facts: first, that the ownership of the cotton was in Samuel Rhea during his life-time; secondly, that the same was seized and sold; and, thirdly, that the proceeds thereof were covered into the United States Treasury.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I object to debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. My colleague has the floor regularly on the hill.

Mr. HOLMAN. My colleague has the floor regularly on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent was asked for him to submit his amendment, but not to debate it.

Mr. HOLMAN. But my colleague has a right to debate. This amendment does not involve an appropriation of money, but the reverse of it. It can rightfully be considered in the House.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then adopt the amendment of my colleague; it is right.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I object until I hear what it is. This bill was reported by me from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. The amendment has been read.

Mr. CAULFIELD. It was read, but unfortunately I did not hear it.

The amendment was again read.
Mr. CAULFIELD. I object to that.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. One objection cannot prevent the offering of the amendment. It is for the House to determine upon it. The question was taken on the amendment; and it was agreed to.

The substitute, as amended, was then adopted.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

RECONSIDERATION OF BILLS PASSED.

Mr. DURHAM. I now move to reconsider the various votes by which the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar to-day have been passed, and I also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. CONGER. I hope that motion will not now be made. We ought to have a day or two in which to ascertain if any mistake has been made in passing any of these bills, which can be corrected by a reconsideration.

Mr. DURHAM. Well, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. DURHAM. Well, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. JENKS. I renew it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the motion will not be insisted upon. These bills have been passed by unanimous consent, and they may be all right. But should a mistake be discovered, we ought not to put it out of our power to correct it.

Mr. JENKS. I will not insist upon the motion.

COURT OF APPEALS.

Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, presented the following memorial of the bar of the city of Detroit; which was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

At a meeting of the bar of the city of Detroit, held at the United States circuit court rooms at Detroit on the 14th day of ____, 1876, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That in the opinion of the bar of the city of Detroit, it is desirable, if a court of appeals shall be established by Congress for each judicial circuit, that provision shall be made for the sitting of said court in each State within the circuit, for the hearing of the appeals arising within that State, and that the courts shall have power by general rules to regulate the mode and form of removing cases for review.

"Resolved, That a committee of five members from this bar shall be appointed to transmit the above resolution, accompanied with an appropriate memorial to our delegation in Congress, to the bar of other States, and to such officers and persons as they shall think proper."

The meeting appointed as the committee provided for by the resolution, Messrs. I. Walker, G. V. N. Lothrop, Alfred Russell, A. B. Maynard, and William A.

MEMORIAL.

Memorial.

The undersigned, a committee of the bar of the city of Detroit, respectfully call your attention to the foregoing resolutions, and hope for your co-operation in the views there expressed.

It seems to be well agreed that some system of intermediate appeal is necessary to relieve the Supreme Court at Washington. But whatever is done in that direction should also aim to make legal redress prompt, easy, and at the least practicable cost to all parties. The bill now before Congress proposes to establish an appeal court for each judicial circuit, and fixes the sessions of that court at a single place in the circuit. Now, each circuit entraces several States, and some circuits include an immense territorial extent. Thus, this circuit includes the large States of Tennessee, Kentucky, Ohio, and Michigan, from the south to the extreme north a distance of near one thousand miles. It seems to us that there are many reasons, and of especial force in such large States, why this court should sit in each State to hear the appeals arising within that State.

1. The expense and inconvenience to the judges would be little, if any, more. The existing court-rooms, marshals, clerks, and other officers of the United States in the several States, could be easily made available to the uses of this court.

2. The saving and convenience of suitors and their counsel would be very great. In many cases it would be safe to say it would diminish the cost of litigation one-half. This will be obvious when the charges of counsel, called to go a long distance and to wait the uncertain progress of a hearing calendar, is considered.

3. It would bring the court into personal and professional intercourse with a much larger circle of members of the bar, and give the latter the great advantage which the sittings of such a court would afford in many ways.

4. Finally, it is obviously desirable that all appeals should, if practicable, be heard and determined in the place where the laws prevail under which the cases have arisen and been tried

There is one other matter not covered by the resolutions, but which has received some attention from the profession here, which we venture briefly to suggest. These courts, in a large majority of cases, will be courts of final adjudication. Sitting entirely independent of each other, it can hardly fail to happen that their judgments will sometimes clash in principle. The painful result will follow, that, on the same ground, what is declared law in one circuit is declared not law in another. Should there not be some mode provided by which such differences would be corrected? Would it not be wise to provide that when a later judgment in one appeal court is substantially inconsistent with a prior solemn ruling in another of such appeal courts, and this fact is certified in the opinion of the court giving the later judgment, that a right shall exist to remove such later judgment to the Supreme Court of the United States for final adjudication?

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution and bills of the House of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 19) on the celebration of the Centennial in the several counties or towns;

An act (H. R. No. 193) for the relief of Ezra B. Barnett, postmaster at Norwich, New York; and

An act (H. R. No. 2285) authorizing the purchase of additional grounds for the custom-house at Nashville, Tennessee.

PAYMENT OF GENEVA AWARD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

In answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 21st ultimo, I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State and accompanying papers, together with a report from the Secretary of the Treasury.

WASHINGTON, March 3, 1876.

The accompanying papers contain the correspondence between the Bank of England and the Treasury Department relative to the transfer of proceeds of United States bonds sold, or about to be sold, in London; and correspondence between the British government and the State Department relative to the mode of transfer to this country of $15,500,000 awarded at Geneva.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the message and accompanying papers be printed, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. Jones, of Kentucky, was granted leave of absence for one week on account of important business.

Mr. GARFIELD was granted leave of absence for next week.

Mr. FRYE was granted leave of absence for ten days.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. REA asked and obtained unanimous consent to have withdrawn from the files of the House certain papers in the case of Jacob Bogert.

GENERAL O. E. BABCOCK.

Mr. BANNING, from the Committee on Military Affairs, by unanimous consent, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War, the Attorney-General, and the Secretary of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, directed to transmit to this House copies of all instructions, orders, letters, telegrams, and other official records or papers at the control of their respective Departments relating to the assembling or the business of the military court of inquiry called to inquire into the conduct of General O. E. Babcock.

Mr. BANNING moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPEACHMENT OF WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

Mr. ASHE. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to ask consent for that committee to sit during the sessions of the House while engaged in preparing suitable articles of impeachment of General William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

There was no objection, and leave was accordingly granted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House now adjourn.
Mr. THROCKMORTON. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion to enable me to submit a resolution for action at this time.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I insist upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the motion to ad-

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 4, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. Tarbox obtained leave of absence for ten days, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House on yesterday, the session of to-day is to be devoted, as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to the further consideration of the Hawaiian treaty bill. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] will please resume the chair.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I move that the House adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there wereayes 40, noes 24.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Before the result of the vote was announced,
Mr. RANDALL said: Mr. Speaker, would it not be competent by unanimous consent to proceed now with other business?
The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair, the order of yesterday would forbid such a proceeding. But the Chair would suggest that by unanimous consent gentlemen desiring to speak as in Committee of the Whole generally might proceed to deliver their speeches.
Mr. BLAND. Are there any such gentlemen?
The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that there are.
Mr. WOOD, of New York. Probably it is incumbent upon me to say a word in explanation of my motion to adjourn. I was not in the a word in explanation of my motion to adjourn. I was not in the House yesterday when the order was made to devote to-day's session to the consideration of the Hawaiian treaty. If I had been present I should probably have objected to that order, on the ground that heretofore during this Congress we have never attempted to transact any business whatever on a Saturday. That day has been given up exclusively to the speeches of gentlemen who desired to speak, not for the purpose of convincing members of the House as to their particular views upon any proposition. I am aware that many members of the House left Washington yesterday, not anticipating that we were to devote to-day to business so important as the consideration of this treaty.

Now, sir, I was interrupted in the discussion of this question the other day when I was attempting to advance arguments for the purpose of convincing gentlemen whose minds were not made up. I have the floor upon this treaty, and desire to finish my speech, not have the floor upon this treaty, and desire to finish my speech, not for buncombe, not for the newspapers, not for posterity, but for the members of the House who are to vote upon this question. Therefore it is that I do not wish to be forced to go on with my speech when there is much less than a quorum present.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] has largely anticipated what I had desired to say. My object was to assume my fair share of the responsibility for the motion to adjourn. I waited upon the gentleman from New York and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. MORRISON] and as a member Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. Morrison,] and as a member of the committee entered my protest against the committee who have been charged by the House with the investigation of this subject proceeding to discuss it on an informal day when members have been notified that no business is to be transacted. I think it due to the House that members of the committee should present their views on an occasion when members generally can hear them, as they cannot to-day.

I rose for the purpose of saying this much and then asking whether Trose for the purpose of saying this much and then asking whether what you, Mr. Speaker, have suggested would not be practicable; in other words, whether, while we could not proceed with business, the day might not be utilized by allowing gentlemen to speak on other subjects, which I hope will be done. If any gentleman, not a member of the committee, is prepared to speak on the Hawaiian treaty, I see no reason why he might not, if he wishes, do so now; but I do not think the committee would be faithfully performing their duty if they were to present their views on a non-business day.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, although the committee who have had and now have the particular charge of the business may not desire to speak to-day, yet, looking over the list of those who do wish to speak on this subject, I observe the names of many members of the House; and, this subject, I observe the names of many members of the House; and, as it is well understood that in the regular proceeding of business in the House the committee have the preference on another day, when there are more members for them to address, it may be that other members of the House, unless they proceed to-day, may have no opportunity to express their sentiments. Hence, they might probably consider it a privilege to be allowed to avail themselves of this occasion for that purious many mithed invited number of heaveness and admires. pose, even with a limited number of hearers and admires. [Laughter.] So that it seems to me a little hard that, this day having been set apart for those who may have no other opportunity to address the House, gentlemen who have this matter in charge should wish to re-

House, gentlemen who have this matter in charge should wish to reserve for the committee all the opportunity there may be to speak upon the subject. Perhaps it might be well to let other gentlemen—some of whom perhaps desire even to speak "for posterity"—embrace this opportunity of expressing their humble views upon this very important subject. I speak the more freely on this occasion because I have no desire to be one of the participants in the discussion.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I am glad that my friend from Michigan, [Mr. Conger] is interested in "posterity." I hope he will do something towards showing practically his interest in that direction. [Laughter.] I certainly do not wish to cut him off if he desires to speak on this question; or I am quite willing to accept the indication of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Keller,] that we resolve ourselves into Committee of the Whole and go on with the discussion of any question on which gentleman may desire to speak.

cussion of any question on which gentleman may desire to speak.

Mr. CONGER. I simply yielded to the gentleman for a suggestion. I will now pursue my remarks.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I hand the gentleman over to "pos-

ority." [Laughter.]
Mr. CONGER. I made my appeal to the gentleman in behalf of the posterity of those gentlemen who may want to speak on this subject.

I wish to say that the suggestion that this day should be devoted to general debate, and not confined to the Hawaiian treaty specially assigned for this occasion, seems to me to be such a departure from the unanimous consent of the House, changing this day's session from the purpose for which it was set apart for another, as would establish which has set apart for another, as would establish a very bad precedent.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, what I proposed to say was in the direction of what has just fallen from the lips of the gentleman from Michigan. Gentlemen will remember that the arrangement heretofore made in reference to the Saturday session has been most religiously and scrupulously adhered to. It has been held that it could not be varied even by unanimous consent on the succeeding day; and for this reason: that the expression of the sense of the House on Saturday, with half a dozen members present, may contravene the agreement of the whole House made on the preceding day. And, Mr. Speaker, if we should ever depart from that precedent, which has been well guarded and maintained, it may happen hereafter that if Saturday be set apart for general debate, and only those gentlemen prepared to make speeches come here, they may vary that agreement of the preceding day in any direction. While the suggestion is made undoubtedly with a view to facilitate business and to a good end perhaps yet, because of these consequences which I have indicated, and which may be fraught with great mischief in the future, I feel it incumbent on me to object to any violation of the order made yesterday.

Mr. RANDALL. I made the motion yesterday in reference to this subject because I wanted every member who wished to speak on the subject of this Hawaiian treaty to have an opportunity to do so, and, further, because the legislative appropriation bill is about ready to be reported and the Committee on Appropriations desire a part of next week, if not the most of it, for the consideration of that important measure. My motion was really in the interest of the fullest discussion of the bill to carry out the Hawaiian treaty. I regret very much, of course, that there is no one here ready to proceed on that or some other subject, although I must confess I think there are as many here other subject, atthough I must contess I think there are as many here now as there are generally present to listen to set speeches. There is a quorum of the House present, and I hope some action will be taken to get clear of this legislation if possible, so as to let us go on with the appropriation bill next week.

Mr. REAGAN. As this bill is confessedly for posterity, and we do not expect any present benefit to flow from it, I will state to the House that I have a few suggestions to make, as much for the purpose of drawing out other suggestions from the committee as for any other purpose; and if the House determines to go on, I will make those suggestions now. I will premise by stating that I have made no special preparation to discuss the subject; but I do, nevertheless, desire to call the special attention of this House to a few points which so far I have not noticed either in the discussion of the subject in the Senate or at all alluded to in the majority and minority reports of our own committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman from Texas will proceed with his remarks.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I should like to get the attention of the gentleman for a moment to ask him a question.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Texas surrendered the

Mr. REAGAN. If entitled to the floor, I am ready to proceed.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] who reported the bill from the Committee of Ways and Means is entitled to the floor in the committee, and the House has not yet resolved itself into the committee on that subject.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to proceed with the consideration of the bill to carry into effect a treaty with the King of the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman from New York has made the motion to adjourn, which is now pending. I hope he will withdraw it.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I understand the gentleman from Texas

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I understand the gentleman from Texas proposes to address the House and not the committee.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not care whether we are in the House or in the committee; I wish to address the members who are now present.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. COX. Then I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. It would be irregular for the gentleman from Texas the Mayer for a the gentleman from Texas to address the House; for, as the gentleman from Maine has suggested, the order of the House setting apart this day for a special purpose ought to be observed strictly. The order of the House is that the bill reported from the Committee of Ways and Means in reference to the Hawaiian treaty shall be debated as in Committee of the Whole, no other business whatever to be transacted.

Mr. KELLEY. Then no further motion is needed, and we are already by order of the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Unless there be objection, the Chair will regard the House as now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill to carry into effect a treaty between the United States and the King of the Hawaiian Islands. There was no objection, and Mr. Sayler took the chair as Speaker

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I do not propose to go on with the speech which I begun on the pending question if a satisfactory arrangement can be effected that hereafter I shall have the balance of the time to which I am entitled as well as the hour which I am entitled to under the rule to close the debate, either to take the balance of my time when the House resumes the consideration of the question, or to have it at the close of the debate in addition to my

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. REAGAN. To address the House on a question of this importance without having investigated it, and in the presence of a committee which has examined the subject laboriously and reached its mittee which has examined the subject laboriously and reached its conclusion as to what ought to be done, is not a light task. I do not propose to make a formal speech on the subject, but only to call attention to a few particulars connected with this bill. It is agreed on all hands that, as a revenue measure, the proposition before the committee is disadvantageous to the United States; that we must sacrifice the public revenues in making it. I believe it is conceded that at present we must lose over $400,000 of revenue annually by this arrangement. It is contended, however, that very great benefits will be secured which will greatly overbalance the injury done us by the loss of revenue. If I remember rightly, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] said, if the loss of revenue was much larger than it confessedly will be, that still there are other advantages in the treaty which compensate us for greater losses than we must sustain.

What is the compensation we are to receive? It is said that we are to secure, in the first place, the carrying trade between the Hawaiian Islands and our Pacific coast. Without having examined that subject much, my impression is that we have that trade now. But whether we do have it now or do not, I desire to suggest that there is nothing in the treaty that gives us any such privilege or advantage; and, if the argument is made that we are to secure the carrying trade, it must be by the virtue of something else than the stipulations in the treaty, for it is not there. I do not choose, then, to go further on that point. It is said however, that the effect of this treaty will be to give point. It is said, however, that the effect of this treaty will be to give us the control of the commerce of those islands. That commerce is not very large.

But it is urged as a much more important feature of the treaty that guard upon the interests of our Pacific coast. How is this to be accomplished by the treaty? We have no stipulation in this treaty securing us any such advantage. There is a stipulation there to which I call attention, in the fourth article of the treaty, that the King of those islands-

Will not lease or otherwise dispose of or create any lien upon any port, harbor, or other territory in his dominions, or grant any special privilege or rights of use therein to any other power, state, or government.

But there is no stipulation securing any such advantages for our Government. A casual reading of this fourth article of the treaty may mislead if it is not investigated. There is an agreement here for reciprocal free trade as to certain specified articles, and a binding of each party that it will not disregard those stipulations; but there is nothing in that article or in any other article in this treaty which secures to us any special territorial or maritime rights or jurisdiction in or connected with the Hawaiian Islands—not a thing. How, then, are we to make that an American colony by a treaty that, except in regard to a very limited number of articles of commerce, gives us no right, no privilege, no benefit over any other nation of the earth?

Where are our benefits to come from? It is said that American influence will control there. How is American influence to be made to control there? Let me say that it seems to be agreed—charged upon one side and not denied upon the other—that there are perhaps thirty or forty sugar-planters in the Hawaiian Islands. It is agreed that as to those sugar-raisers in the islands the effect of the treaty is to give them a bonus on the sugar and other saccharine products equivalent to the rate of our duty upon those articles. It is to give them that bonus. It is also agreed and understood that it is to confer special advantages upon a few sugar-refiners in California. The benefit that it gives to these persons is not a national but an individual benefit for individual use. How is that to develop American interests there?

Let me say further that the sugar-planters there—and I call the at-tention of members of the committee to this and desire an expression from them upon the question-that the sugar-planters, when this treaty is made, if it shall be, will consult their own pecuniary interests, and not our national aggrandizement. What will their pecuniary interest rightly and necessarily induce them to do? They stand upon the half-way station between the western coast of America and the teeming millions of Asia, where labor is very cheap. When those men go to make sugar there, will they take there those engaged in the industrial pursuits of America to Americanize that island, so as to fit it to become an American colony at some future day? Who believes that they will pay double to American citizens less qualified for the duty than they would pay to the Asiatics as well or better qualified for that duty? If then the capacity of that territory is sufficient to develop a large production of sugar and molasses—on which I do not propose to speak, for I have not informed myself particularly on that subject-the sugar-planters there, following the instincts of interest, will apply to Asia for the labor that is to make the sugar and molasses which are to come here free. If they do that, and if there are fields, productive fields in the Hawaiian Islands open for a large population, that population, instead of being American, will be Asiatic; and when once that Asiatic population is planted upon the Hawaiian Islands in large numbers, American emigration, except such capitalists as may proceed there who are connected with commerce or the sugarproducing interest, will not go there, cannot go there, cannot and will not mingle with the Asiatic population where it is in the ascendency, as the policy of this treaty in my judgment will place it. If I am right in this, we are not going to make an American colony on the Hawaiian Islands westward toward Asia, but we are to make an Asiatic colony eastward to the Hawaiian Islands, and plant there a population which will in future exclude the possibility of making there an American colony.

If I am right about this, and I simply address the question to the House, I ask the consideration of it by those who are examining this House, I ask the consideration of it by those who are examining this question whether we are not preparing to adopt a policy which would defeat the very purpose which is proclaimed here?

Mr. KELLEY. With the gentleman's leave, I would confirm his deduction by stating that the wages paid there to native Hawaiians, Japanese, and Chinese, under annual contract, are $8 a month and board, and $11 a month if the laborer boards himself, showing that the consideration for the subsistence of the laboring population of the island is $3 a month. Of course no American laborer, no Caucasian will go there for any such wages.

casian, will go there for any such wages.

Mr. REAGAN. I am obliged to the gentleman from Pennsylvania Mr. REAGAN. I am obliged to the gentleman from Femsylvania for the facts which he has stated, because it has come in the line of his investigation to develop facts as a member of the committee, but I have not gone into that field. I am only speaking of the general proposition. If the policy of this treaty is to make it impracticable to make these islands in future an American colony, that seems to me to be an answer very largely to the policy of the bill.

I desire now to call the attention of the committee to one other feature, which it seems to me to be rightly considered in considering the policy of adopting this treaty or passing a law to put it in force. The Hawaiian Islands are a long way from the American coast. The government of these islands will appoint its own officials to execute the treaty upon its side, to determine what productions specified in the treaty are protected in these islands. We cannot control that; but, even if we could control it and put our own officers there, it would hardly change the feature to which I desire to call the attention of the committee.

Mr. KELLEY. Before the gentleman from Texas proceeds I would like to suggest to him that he has exaggerated the number of plant-like to suggest to him that he has exaggerated the number of planters there. Instead of forty there are but twenty-six.

Mr. RFAGAN. I am obliged to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for the correction. I did not wish to understate the number, and it makes the case stronger than I even supposed. What I am now calling the attention of the committee to is, that there lies in the torrid zone to the south and southwest of these islands almost a thousand small islands, and there lies beyond those islands the East Indies, where many of the very articles provided for in the treaty are produced. If these people should find it to their interest to turn that trade to this country, it is only necessary for subordinate officials to bring the productions of that vast field of islands which lie in the tropics and of the East Indies through the Hawaiian Islands and bring them into our ports free of duty.

But you may say that this would involve official misconduct. member the character of these people. Look at the people of Mexico and of the South American states; look at the character of the Eastern people. We all know that the official duties of their subordinate officers are made a matter of commerce, or of bribery and corruption in other words. What guarantee can we have that the officers in these islands will not pass through these islands from the southwest and from the East Indies the productions named in the treaty, and bring them into the ports of the United States free of duty?

Now, the treaty provides that regulations shall be made between Now, the treaty provides that regulations shall be made between the two governments on this subject; but what control have we over subordinate officers a thousand miles from our own shores, and where they are practically independent, and in these days, in our own country even, there is a very insufficient guarantee of honest administration by the officials of the Government? Taking the facts all together, I submit the question for consideration whether there is not, if this treaty be adopted, great danger that large amounts of products will be brought into the United States free of duty that have not been raised in the Hawaijan Islands? raised in the Hawaiian Islands?

Recurring now to the point about conferring benefit upon the twenty-six sugar-planters in these islands and the few sugar-refiners on the Pacific coast, I beg to call attention to the fact that while we on the Pacific coast, I beg to call attention to the fact that while we may enrich these few persons individually, we have to supply the revenue to enrich them by taxation upon other citizens and other interests throughout the country. It is also a policy injurious to the production of sugar and molasses in this country. It is conferring a bonus individually on a few men at the expense of the many—a thing which, in my judgment, ought never to be done, and which, I think, will inevitably be done if this treaty is consented to, or rather if we pass a law to put it in force.

But the great point made is that this treaty will give us a parallel.

But the great point made is that this treaty will give us a naval station on the Pacific coast. The treaty will not give us any such thing, for it contains no stipulation to that effect. I have tried to call attention to the fact that by the ordinary as of human action we may expect that the effect of such a treaty as this will be to make that an Asiatic and not an American colony, and hardly expect the result which is claimed. If we I have tried to call attention to the fact that by the ordinary rules this will be to make that an Asiatic and not an American colony, and therefore we need hardly expect the result which is claimed. If we could obtain the possession of those islands, and such possession is not provided for by this treaty, and, in my judgment, it can hardly be considered the legitimate outgrowth of the policy of the treaty—if we could obtain possession of those islands, it would involve the necessity of fortifying, of going to an enormous expense to build fortifications and naval stations, and to man this outpost far out in the

I concede that in the case of a war with a great maritime power it may be to our interest to hold these islands if we can. But at the same time I say that the chances of benefit resulting from this treaty are not such as to justify us for the loss of revenue involved in it. and for the expenditure of the millions which must be made in order to place it in our power to hold these islands. If they are fortified the forts must be manned. If we prepare to defend these islands and hold them against all comers for all time to come, then forts must be built, and these forts must be manned, and the islands officered, making the expense very great. It seems to me that the same millions which would enable us to obtain control of these islands, to fortify, protect, and defend them, had much better in the present condition of this country be appropriated for the improvement of our own country and people, and for consolidating its strength and promoting its prosperity.

One other remark I have to make, which I think it right to make. do not think that any wise man who loves his country and hopes for it a great future will desire at this time to annex any more Indians, Asiatics, and Africans. Already such a strain has been placed upon our Government and Constitution by the enlargement of the elective franchise as to have placed our Constitution and very form of our Government in peril. Every step we may take to extend our borders over new fields of this class of population, who do not understand our system of government or any system of local self-government, who are not fitted by education or morals for local self-government, who ought not to be incorporated into our population until we can unify the various elements of our present population and restore the healthful action of the form of Government given us by our fathers—not until that is done should we look forward to see what we can do in the way of adding others to our population.

We are receiving every year some hundreds of thousands of foreign population that has to be educated into a knowledge of the princi-ples of our government. We have now a black population of some even or eight hundred thousand voters, who have to be educated into a knowledge of the duties of citizenship, into a capacity for self-gov-ernment, into an understanding of the advantages of government and law protecting all alike, securing the rights of all alike, at an equal and just expense to all alike.

This problem of maintaining a constitutional Government must loom up in the view of every man who looks anxiously to the future of this great Republic. True wisdom and statesmanship call upon us not to seek to ingraft into our body-politic any more such elements until we have secured the stability of our Government with those we have already incorporated. I say this because the people now on these islands are not fitted for our system of government. In my judgment there is nothing in this treaty which proposes to fit the population there for our system of government, or even to establish an American colony there.

If I am asked what I would do to protect our commerce on the Pacific Ocean and to guard our Pacific coast against the dangers of assault from great naval powers, I would say that I have great confidence in the wise expression of Mr. Webster, when Secretary of State, who said: "We cannot permit another power to take possession of these islands." We occupy a position which enables us, if we will be just to other nations, to say to them that they shall not menace our national security. A policy indicated through the State Department of a determination to permit no other power in violation of the Monroe doctrine—and in extension of it if you please, if that can be called an extension which would reach to the Hawaiian Islands—that we will not permit any other government or power to occupy, fortify, and hold these islands, will afford us all the security we may need. We are more likely to have these islands come to us through natural laws than through the operation of a treaty which makes it the interest of a few sugar-planters to colonize these islands with laborers from Asia, to make it an Asiatic colony, in order to produce an abundance of cheap sugar, to come in competition with that produced by our own citizens on our own soil, and requiring the great body of American people to pay a bonus to them as individuals, and to do so under circumstances which can hardly lead us to suppose that we can ever make that an American colony.

ever make that an American colony.

I have said more, Mr. Speaker, than I expected to say when I arose.

I simply desired, in this off-hand way, to call the attention to those points, lest I might not have an opportunity to do so in the regular debate, because, with my convictions, I shall vote against the passage of this bill, for the controlling reasons which I have stated.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, I have observed with much pleasure that

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, I have observed with much pleasure that the convention for the extension of the trade of the United States with the Hawaiian Islands was advised in the Senate by the triumphant majority of 51 against 12 votes, and has been sent to this House for its approval and appropriate legislation. Under the policy which has now for many years controlled the legislation of this country the industry of the people has been unduly diverted to manufacturing pursuits. Over-production and a want of employment have followed. For the present the home demand can scarcely be increased, and it has become incumbent on Congress to do whatever is fairly in its power to open or extend markets abroad. This is one of the direct results which will be accomplished by the proposed treaty, and hence it should be supported by the Representatives of the people without distinction of party.

The treaty also provides for the admission of certain articles, and, notably, unrefined sugar, into the United States free of duties. It cannot be expected that commercial privileges such as we shall obtain if the treaty should be fully confirmed can be accorded to us without some equivalent. At the same time it is clear to me that the advantages given to the people of the Hawaiian Islands by the proposed arrangement are also advantages to ourselves. By the stimulus given to industry in the islands an increased demand not only for our manufactures but also for our agricultural productions, most of which are essentially different from those of the tropics, will be created, and the mutually beneficial exchange will be effected by our own sailors and ships, thus giving another impetus to our national progress.

actures but also for our agricultural productions, most of which are essentially different from those of the tropics, will be created, and the mutually beneficial exchange will be effected by our own sailors and ships, thus giving another impetus to our national progress.

The discussions which have engaged so large a share of public attention, as to the opposing doctrines of free trade and "protection," are now of diminished importance. The taxation needed for the expenses of government and interest on the national debt is already so burdensome that argument as to the expediency of levying further taxes on the many for the benefit of the few should by common consent be postponed. Revenue with the least possible injury to the people is the proper object of the tariff.

So long as our observation of the prices we are compelled to pay on the articles we use or consume is confined to our own country only we lose sight of their injurious effect. When we compare prices in our own country with those of the world at large, we ascertain our condition with tolerable precision. The competition to which our shipping is subjected on the ocean, in trade with other countries, affords a strong illustration of this rule. Before 1860, 75 to 80 per cent. of our foreign commerce was in American vessels. The proportions are now almost literally reversed, over 72 per cent. being carried in the vessels of other countries. Of our whole foreign carrying trade, little more than one fourth is under our own flag. The earnings of the trade were recently estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury to be more than a hundred millions of dollars yearly. In 1872, the amount paid to foreign steamships for freight and passage money, was $134,742,441. When we consider that such sums are paid annually, and that our ship-owners, sailors, and others formerly enjoyed the pre-eminence and chief profits in a trade now so nearly monopolized by foreigners, it is plain that a liberal and comprehensive change is needed in legislation. Upon similar principles, judiciously applied, a strong stimulus could be given to the exports of many manufactures, and the additional labor employed in their production would increase the demand for agricultural products and the home consumption of those manufactures to which the condition of our country is specially adapted.

The theory of protecting and encouraging industry by high duties, levied, in the main, upon the industrious, has long been tried, while no legislative efforts have been made to attain the same object by the judicious application of the lowest taxation consistent with the needful revenue. While our tariff levies duties on nearly twenty-five hundred different and distinctly-enumerated articles or classes of articles, the whole British tariff includes only fourteen; all others are supplied to her consumers free of duty. Although we cannot yet attain the same simplicity, it would be wise to take steps in that direction. Whenever a revision of our tariff takes place, as it must at no distant day, whatever diminution of revenue may be caused by the Hawaiian treaty will be unimportant in comparison with the benefits derived by the country at large.

While some diminution of our revenue on certain articles may be expected to follow the removal of duties as required by the treaty, I have yet to learn that taxation is the chief purpose of government, which is instituted and maintained for the benefit of our citizens. The money which might be taken by the custom-house officials from the pockets of the people will be spent in other articles, many of them yielding revenue to the Government, or be re-invested in industrial pursuits productive of the prosperity and wealth which are the surest sources of national income, and enable the people to pay necessary taxes without revining.

The advantages of the treaty are in some degree local. They will accrue primarily and for the present chiefly to the benefit of our fellow-citizens on the Pacific coast. But that is a narrow, unwise, and destructive statesmanship which would, on such grounds, lead those who live in other parts of the Union to regard the treaty with indifference or, yet worse, endeavor to prevent its provisions from becoming part of the laws of the Union. One of the cardinal principles of our legislation should always be no less to promote the legitimate interests of each part of our country than to protect it from attack by foreign foes, and I know of no more probable source of future danger than neglect of this obvious duty. The welfare of the whole Union is intimately connected and bound up with that of every State. If one member suffers, all in fact suffer with it, and apart even from all ties of sentiment and their very important results, each has a material profit from the prosperity of the others.

The manufactured, agricultural, and mineral productions to be admitted under the treaty free of duty into the Hawaiian Islands will to a very considerable extent be brought from the Atlantic coast and all other parts of the Union.* Yet even this view of the subject is not that which is most important to the nation at large. Placed as our continent is midway between the leading commercial nations on the European side of the Atlantic and those oriental realms whose trade has always enriched those who have obtained it, and is now one of the chief objects of solicitude and competition among the different states of Europe, it is to what has been usually termed "the East," but is to us the West—the region on the other great continent fronting our Pacific coast—and to South America that we must look for the natural openings for our manufacturing ingenuity and enterprise.

The purchase of a preponderating interest in the Suez Canal has justly been regarded as a masterpiece of statesmanship and far-seeing policy on the part of Great Britain. Its object is to maintain for that country its supremacy in oriental trade. I regard the treaty with the Hawaiian Islands as scarcely less important to our people than the control of the Suez Canal is to British subjects. China and Japan are among the chief fields for our commercial and manufacturing enterprise, and it is of the utmost importance that we should possess adequate naval stations in the Pacific Ocean.

It is also our duty to legislate with due regard to the more remote future. Vast as the difficulties attending the opening of a ship-canal between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans undoubtedly are, the resources of modern science make the whole question one simply of cost, and the benefits which would demonstrably result from it to the commerce of the world, and especially to that of the United States, prove that the necessary expenditures would be amply remunerative.

By the completion of this great work remote nations would for all practical purposes be brought nearer the commercial centers of the

By the completion of this great work remote nations would for all practical purposes be brought nearer the commercial centers of the world by thousands of miles, and the trade of the globe would receive a stronger stimulus than has ever before been given to it. The Suez Canal itself could never compete successfully with such a work not only for the exchanges of this continent, through part of which it would pass, but for those of many other nations, the passage by the Mediterranean and Red Seas being too uncertain to be used extensively by sailing vessels whenever means of communication through the American isthmus are established.

Recent surveys carefully made by officers of the United States show that a ship-canal through the American isthmus is practicable, and its completion is only a question of time. When that period arrives enormous and unprecedented changes will take place in the commerce of the world, and our maritime interests will acquire an importance incalculably exceeding any they have ever yet attained. Although the benefits will affect mankind at large, they must accrue to the people of this country far more extensively than to those of any other. It is in this view of a certain and, historically speaking, not distant future that the real value becomes apparent of such safe and convenient harbors on the track of our commerce in the Pacific as the Hawaiian Islands afford. Hence, the proposed treaty is of far greater concern to us than in the mere exchange of the commodities specified by it. His Hawaiian Majesty stipulates that during the continuance of the treaty he will not lease or alienate any port, harbor, or other territory in his dominions to any other power or government. By its adoption the interests of the United States are, as far as is at present practicable, established in the islands.

For these reasons I regard the Hawaiian Islands, although no part For these reasons I regard the Hawaiian Islands, although no part of this continent, yet as commercially, politically, and in fact as part of its appurtenances, and to be properly included in the application of the Monroe doctrine, prohibiting the intervention of European powers in them. Of this it was well said by President Johnson in his message of December 5, 1865, that it has as law been "sanctioned by time, and by its good results has approved itself to both continents." We all remember how Mr. Seward, soon after the civil war had ceased, asserted this doctrine, and urged the evacuation of Mexico by the French in language addressed to our minister in France, and not the less significant because it was duly courteous. "We shall," he said, "be gratified when the Emperor shall, either through the channel of your esteemed correspondence or otherwise, give definite information your esteemed correspondence or otherwise, give definite information of the time when French military operations may be expected to cease in Mexico." We all know the auspicious events which followed as the in Mexico." We all know the auspicious events which followed as the practical result of this national assertion. In my judgment the proposed treaty with the Hawaiian Islands has a similar tendency. If we refuse, it is certain that they will form at least commercial alliances with Great Britain and her colonies, and such an opportunity as now presents itself will be lost to us forever. In a naval and mili-tary point of view, many of our highest authorities have repeatedly warned us not to permit the islands to pass into the hands of any for-

It appears to me that however just and proper and gratifying to an honorable national pride the Monroe doctrine in itself may be, it is imperfect and little more than a barren ideality, unless, in an enlightened self-interest, we associate it with a friendly care for the commercial and material prosperity of the states we have so far taken under our protection. If we prohibit the interference of European nations with the states of this continent, shall we stop at that point and cultiwith the states of this continent, shall we stop at that point and cultivate no further increase of friendly relations with them? I for one have the strongest possible faith in the manifest destiny of our people, and that a series of united states will exist from the cold regions of the north, so far as they can be inhabited by civilized man, down to the southern verge of the American continent, and include the islands adjacent to it. We, with our rapidly increasing 40,000,000 of people, shall be, so to speak, the key-stone of the arch—no barrier in the way of intercourse, but doing all we can to facilitate it, we ourselves necessarily partaking, at least to as high a degree as any others, in the prosperity which would thus be inaugurated and established.

The progress of this manifest destiny, however much it may have been delayed by events which none can lament more deeply than I do, is now perhaps the most important of all the problems in our future. How shall it be consummated? Manifestly, it would not be creditable to us, and it should be abhorent to our desires, to work it out by means of the cruelties, barbarities, and piratic robberies of war. Nor should it be done by the ever corrupt and corrupting influences of purchase, by taking money from the pockets of our already overbur-dened people to bribe others to enter into the Union and partake with us of what, if we are true to ourselves and posterity, are its inestima-ble privileges. Let us by the force of those necessities which compel men to seek interchangeable supplies, exchange the products of their industry, attract the neighboring States to ourselves and each other, reversing the policy of oppressors, which has ever been to divide mankind and keep them separate, that they might the more easily conquer and command them. In this way the consummation of our manifest destiny will be solved in accordance with the principles of the highest civilization. It is more than doubtful if in any other manner it can ever be accomplished at all.

The policy I have described could not fail to command the admiration and good-will of liberal and enlightened statesmen throughout the world. I commend to your attention the wise and noble thoughts of John Bright, expressed in the British Parliament, on the development of the Monroe doctrine in a civilized and unobjectionable form, throughout the whole length and breadth of the American continent and the adjacent islands. In reply to Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, Mr.

Bright said:

Bright said:

There cannot be a meaner motive than this that I am speaking of in forming a judgment on this question, that it is "better for us" (meaning the people of Great Britain) that the American continent should be as the continent of Europe is severed into many states and subject to all the contentions and disasters which have accompanied the history of the states of Europe.

I should say that, if a man had a great heart within him, he would rather look forward to the day when from that point of land which is habitable nearest to the pole to the shores of the great gulf the whole of that vast continent might become one great federation of states, that, without a great army and without a great navy, not mixing itself up with the entanglements of European politics, without a custom-house inside through the whole length and breadth of its territory, but with freedom everywhere, equality everywhere, law everywhere, peace everywhere, would afford at least some hope that man is not forsaken of heaven and that the future of our race might be better than the past.

Without pursuing the comparison in detail, it is unquestionable that if our commerce with the Hawaiian Islands is worthy of special attention, that with the Dominion of Canada is almost incalculably more so; and the argument loses nothing of its force, either commercially or politically, when we consider the limited area of the islands and the vast territory of the Dominion to be inhabited by people who are sprung like ourselves from the foremost nations of the Old World and whose numbers will be computed by the hundred of millions.

Our commercial relations with the southern countries of this continent have long been unsatisfactory. By extending our exchanges with them we should acquire the chief benefits of actual ownership without its disadvantages. Additional capital would be attracted to Mexico and Central America. Labor in those countries would meet with more remunerative and regular employment. Thus an antidote would be provided to restless insubordination and want of steady industry. Personal intercourse among the inhabitants of the different portions of the continent would be incalculably promoted. The attrition would destroy mutual prejudices. Migration would take place to and fro between distant regions. As the industry of the inhabitants of every part would be more amply remunerated, they would be enabled to buy more largely from each other. We being the most advanced manufacturers on this continent, the chief share of increase in the sale of manufactured articles would accrue to us; but all would be benefited. The prices of articles of tropical origin to the people of the United States and Canada would be diminished. Thus the cost of living and of production would be reduced; industry throughout the continent would be encouraged by the extension of our markets, and would be enabled better to compete abroad with other countries. No other course, so readily adopted, would tend so much to diffuse the ideas and industrial habits of the northern and most advanced nations of the world.

Commerce with Cuba has long been in a very unsatisfactory condition. Our importations from her in 1874 amounted to the large sum of $86,272,466, while our exports of domestic origin to her were only $19,597,981; the balance of $66,674,485—except less than two millions of foreign goods exported from this country—was necessarily paid in gold or its equivalent in bills of exchange on other countries. point in our foreign relations is more worthy of attention than this. The vast sum thus paid yearly to Cuba would soon enable us to resume specie payments if we could pay it in the products of our industry in other forms. It is believed that much might be done in this direction by an honorable treaty with Spain, tending not only to the com-mercial benefit of all parties concerned, but to terminate the unfortu-nate relations between her and Cuba by harmonizing their mutual

This belief derives additional strength from the statement made some years ago on official authority, that in the project of a treaty drawn up by the Spanish minister at Washington arrangements were suggested for an extensive reciprocity of trade between the United States and Cuba as a satisfactory solution of difficulties existing at that time.

The people and government of Mexico, and those of Canada, are undoubtedly desirous of wider commercial intercourse with us. Our trade with those countries, if relieved from unnatural obstacles, would certainly attain gigantic proportions at no distant day. We should not covet their territory but desire their trade and the harmonious development of our various resources, leaving us free from the responsibilities and burden of managing their affairs, and least of all should we, by money wrung from the earnings of our already overtaxed citizens, endeavor to annex foreign territory, or any part of it, and give others a share in governing us. The certainty of an economical, free, and pure government should be the attraction on which we rely. Admission into the Union should be regarded as a privilege, not as a matter of bargain and sale.

The trade we might soon have with Mexico is of incalculable importance. She is capable of supplying our rapidly increasing population with tropical productions for centuries to come. Last year our imports of the products of the sugar-cane from Cuba alone amounted to $75,728,448, while those from all other countries were only $17,120,755. Yet the supply of these necessary articles from Cuba is liable to be cut off almost at any time by the emancipation of the slaves through whose labor it is produced. The same immediate results which followed emancipation in the other West Indian islands must be expected in Cuba. It is therefore advisable that, with wise foresight, we should provide other sources of supply. Mexico alone can furnish them, and she can do so abundantly. Her population already amounts to 9,000,000, being six times as large as that of Cuba, which is 1,500,000: a fair index to the probable consumption of our products the people of the two countries under similar conditions of trade. Hitherto her industrial development has been materially crippled by the absence of cheap transportation for her products from the rich lands of the interior. Railroads are now removing this obstacle, and their construction affords the best opportunity that will ever arise for us to open a mutually beneficial exchange of the products of the in-dustry of our people for many articles now of prime necessity, and which we cannot advantageously raise in our own country, but are abundantly produced in Mexico.

Under a good commercial treaty or customs union with Mexico, many years would not elapse before her territory would be intersected with a network of railways carrying prosperity into every part, the amount of our productions taken in exchange for hers would far examount of our productions taken in exchange for hers would far exceed the enormous sum now paid annually to Cuba, and the difficulties arising from the Zona Libre or Free Belt, on our frontier would immediately be settled; while the more remote political results which would arise from the increased intercourse of the people of both countries, through the development of their natural commercial union, must be obvious to all thinking men.

It should also be remembered that by the adoption of an American commercial system we should not only supersede the demand upon us for the specie or bills of exchange now paid for tropical produc-tions, but become also the intermediate carriers and factors for the trade which would be indefinitely extended between our neighbors in Canada on the north and those in Mexico on the south. The Canadians, by their recent proposals for a treaty of trade with the United States, and the Mexicans, by the liberal concessions their government has made, providing for a railroad nearly seven hundred miles in length, from the city of Leon to connect with the international railroad of Texas, and thus with the railway system of the United States, prove their appreciation of the benefits to be derived from enlarged commercial intercourse with our citizens, who, we may be sure, will not transact business if it is not to their profit.

Such a treaty with Spain as would insure free admission into Cuba for our flour, other provisions, and various articles of manufacture would be worth more than the fee-simple of the island itself to the farmers and manufacturers and merchants of the United States; and the commerce created by a similar arrangement with Mexico would benefit the manufacturers of New England and Pennsylvania far more than the conquest or purchase of half the Mexican territory.

By these means each country that became a party to the arrangement would be brought face to face with the actual interests naturally arising from its condition; prejudices founded on erroneous opinions would be destroyed. Whatever political relations would really be mutually advantageous would follow as the natural results of friendly and beneficial intercourse. The people of the United States would be enabled by practical experience to decide how far peace and perfectly reciprocal commerce with adjacent countries are preferable to admitting dissimilar nations to a share of power in governing us, and to the ancient European system of establishing jurisdiction over them. The adoption of these principles would be the initiation of a favorable revolution in our commerce. The change in our foreign relations, and the benefits arising from it, would in every part of our country give an impetus to the industry and spirit of enterprise which abound among us, and develop them to the utmost; we should no longer see the great prizes of trade with the countries adjacent to us fall into the hands of others, while the character of our people and our unequaled agricultural, mining, manufacturing, and commercial facilities give us the means of grasping and retaining them.

The commercial relations of the different countries of this continent being founded not only on the present condition of their people, but on their unalterable positions and variations of climate, unlike those topics which are temporarily brought forward for purposes of faction or excitement, and are dropped forever when a vote has been taken on them, will constantly recur, in various shapes, as sources of debate, irritation, and, perhaps, of embroilment, until they are brought upon the natural level of perfect freedom.

Regarding the proposed treaty with the Hawaiian Islands as the precursor of more extended and beneficial measures, I trust it will receive the sanction of the House

Mr. JACOBS. There is no doubt but what a Delegate, having no right to vote on the measures proposed here, and no right to participate as a committeeman in the primary discussion of what is best to recommend and what is best not to recommend, should feel a degree of delicacy in the discussion of a measure of this kind. But as this of delicacy in the discussion of a measure of this kind. But as this measure is of local importance as well as of national interest, I venture to trespass upon the time of the House for a short time in presenting a few considerations in its favor. Western Washington especially and the whole Pacific coast generally are directly interested in the passage of this bill. Much of the lumber and timber used by the people of the Sandwich Islands are supplied by Washington Territory. Besides these a considerable quantity of grain, feed, and provisions are shipped by my people to these islands annually. All of these under the stipulations of this treaty are to be admitted free of duty.

There are immense forests of timber north of Washington Territory in British Columbia, and large quantities of lumber are manufactured there, and, to a very great extent, these British mills have supplied the islands with lumber and timber. But the adoption of this measure will give us the whole of this trade, thereby giving profitably increased employment to our mills and the carrying trade to our ships, and thus increase our exportations at least one hundred thousand

The extent of our foreign commerce and the value of our exporta-tions I am not able definitely to state. The records of the custom-house at Port Townsend show much of our foreign commerce but not all, because all of the lumber and timber, live-stock, grain, and provisions shipped from the Territory down the Columbia River would appear on the records of the Astoria custom-house on the Oregon side. From the records of the Port Townsend custom-house it appears for the year ending June 30, 1875, the value of exports from the Puget Sound district to foreign countries was—

In American vessels $559,060 00
In foreign vessels 200,170 00

Sixty-one thousand of this went to the Sandwich Islands. Add sixty thousand more by way of the Columbia River, and you will have the approximate amount. The value of imports of all kinds from all foreign countries whose ships visit the sound is short of fifty thousand for the same time.

The exportation of lumber and timber, live stock, grain, and provisions from Oregon to the islands must be at least three times the amount shipped from Washington Territory.

This commerce, so far as my Territory is concerned, is constantly on the increase

The principal commodities imported from the islands to either Oregon or the Territory are sugar and salt, principally the former. Now, there is no good reason why these articles should not be admitted free of duty, in part compensation for far greater advantages derived by us from this friendly legislation. It must be remembered that but a limited quantity of sugar is produced on the Pacific coast, far less than is demanded to supply the wants of the people. There is no maple sugar produced there and none manufactured from the sugarcane.

The imposition of a duty would not benefit the producers of this article in the Mississippi Valley, because the cost of transportation by rail for over three thousand miles would be as great as a moderate duty. Sailing-vessels coming in ballast from the islands would bring it at a cost of not over $3 per ton. Sugar would be worth no more per pound to the producer; the profit would all go to the carrier. Besides there is an abundant and remunerative market for all the sugar produced in the United States among the people living east of the Rocky Mountains. The only effect, then, of a tariff on island sugar would be to compel us to pay a higher price for what we consumed than is paid by the rest of the people of the United States without any corresponding benefit to anybody.

A tariff whose only effect is to raise the price of the article to the

A tarm whose only elect is to laise the piles of the article to the added amount of the duty imposed, is, in my judgment, bad policy. Especially is this so when the natural product of the country does not and cannot supply the demand. It is often and perhaps always true that when there is an abundance of the raw material and the principal value of the manufactured article arises from the cost of its principal value of the manufactured article arises from the cost of its manufacture, and that requires the expenditure of large sums of money, that a tariff is necessary to support the industry for a time against the crushing competition of organized, vested, and productive foreign capital. But it has always been contended—and I believe the facts sustain the position—that, owing to the genius and enterprise of American mechanics and artisans—the result has been the production of a cheaper article. But, as a general rule, a tariff has never increased the production of the raw material. It cannot increase the area of cotton lands or of cane lands.

But, while under the provisions of this treaty the balance of trade might not always be in our favor, there is a higher, broader, national view of this subject which ought to command the attention of this Congress. The silver rule has, to a great extent, become the law of nations, founded on the higher considerations of self-protection and self-defense. British Columbia can furnish the people of the Sandself-defense. British Columbia can furnish the people of the Sandwich Islands all they need to import, and will gladly receive, I have no doubt, on the same favorable conditions now offered to this nation, all they desire to export. Reject this treaty and its friendly offers and the islands must inevitably pass under British policy and British control.

Already has the British government a circle of island possessions, extending from Vancouver Island to Australia. The Sandwich Islands are the only break in the otherwise continuous chain.

England has a large and well-appointed naval station at Esquimalt, in the straits of Fuca, keeping watch and ward over her possessions in the Pacific Ocean. She courts these islands as a naval station for building up her power in the Pacific, and, as I have already said, their possession would complete the chain of her possessions there. In case of war their possession would be invaluable to her, giving her a position in front of the Pacific States and Territories, with access to friendly harbors open winter and summer. With these naval advantages in her possession and with the naval armament she keeps upon the Pacific coast north of us, our commerce would be speedily wept from the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. WOODWORTH. As there seems to be a lull in this debate, I rise to ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to speak for a few moments upon a subject other than the Hawaiian treaty.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SAYLER.) The Chair will state the rule in regard to that.

The House is now as in Committee of the Whole; and the rule is, that a member speaking "in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is not bound to confine himself to the question under debate, except where a special order is pending, when the debate must be confined strictly to the measure under consideration;" which is the present case. If, however, there be no objection, the Chair will not enforce the rule. Is there any objection to hearing the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WOODWORTH] upon another subject than that under consideration?

There was no objection.

BOUNTIES.

Mr. WOODWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I seize the opportunity offered by the courtesy of the Committee of the Whole House, sitting to consider the Hawaiian treaty, to call up for discussion House bill No. 1462, granting bounties to the heirs of soldiers of the late war who enlisted for a less time than one year, and who were killed or died in consequence of the service. This bill was introduced by myself on the 24th day of January last, and was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, who, up to this time, have taken no action whatever with regard to it. I have reason to apprehend that the partiality of the regard to it. I have reason to apprehend that the partiality of the gentlemen who form that adjunct to this House is so great for my proposition that they have administered to it a soporific, and that it s now in some snug pigeon-hole of their committee-room sleeping the "sleep that knows not breaking."

I intend by this remark no arraignment of our Military Committee, composed as it is of gentlemen once distinguished in the field upon both sides of the rebellion, but certainly their non-action for so long both sides of the rebellion, but certainly their non-action for so long a period justifies this apprehension. Unless, sir, I shall be obliged to, I do not propose to submit to this silent strangulation of this plainly just and entirely feasible proposition. My only resort is to appeal to two-thirds of the House to pass the bill under a suspension of the rules. This course I shall adopt, and I give notice, here and now, that upon Monday next, if I can obtain the floor, or, failing in that, upon the first Monday thereafter that the Speaker will recognize me for that purpose, I will offer this bill and demand a vote upon the question of superding the rules and passing it. This will require question of suspending the rules and passing it. This will require a two-thirds vote I know, but I have little apprehension of defeat, so great is my confidence in the merit of the bill, if I can get the more prominent facts and reasons in its behalf before the House. To present these as best I may be able is my purpose in taking the floor to-day.

I can perhaps best and most tersely convey an understanding of the objects and provisions of the bill by asking that it be read, for which purpose I send it to the Clerk's desk.
The Clerk read as follows:

A bill granting bounties to heirs of soldiers who enlisted in the service of the United States during the war for the suppression of the rebellion for a less period than one year, and who were killed or who have died by reason of such service.

than one year, and who were killed or who have died by reason of such service. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the heirs of any soldier who was killed or died while in the military service of the United States, in the line of duty, during the war for the suppression of the rebellion, whose period of cellistment was for less than one year, or who shall have since died by reason of wounds received or disease contracted while in such service, shall be entitled to receive the same bounties as if said soldier had enlisted for three years: Provided, That the heirs so entitled shall be such only as are named in the first section of the act of July 11, 1862: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall authorize the payment on account of any soldier who has received bounty from the Government of the United States.

Mr. BLAND. I wish to ask the gentleman whether a bill similar

Mr. BLAND. I wish to ask the gentleman whether a bill similar to this was not passed by Congress and vetoed by the President?

Mr. WOODWORTH. This bill passed the House during the last Congress, but did not pass in the Senate. No bill of this sort was vetoed by the President. Even the general bounty bill which failed to become a law was not vetoed by the President.

Mr. BLAND. Was not a bill similar to this vetoed?

Mr. WOODWORTH. No bounty bill was vetoed by the President during the last Congress.

Mr. BLAND. The country understood that that was substantially

The country understood that that was substantially

Mr. WOODWORTH. The country then was mistaken. As I said a moment since, this bill, substantially as read, passed the last House by an almost unanimous vote, but for some reason unknown to me-certainly not its want of merit—it failed to receive action in the Senate. It was introduced and advocated, let me say, by Ex-Governor Marcus L. Ward, of New Jersey, a gentleman who for patriotic services during the war and for zeal displayed in the interests of the soldier since that time stands second to no man in the country. I say this, as I do not wish to seem to be assuming the authorship of the bill. The credit properly belongs to the gentleman to whom I have referred, and I am glad to accord it to him. I presume now that I will be allowed to proceed.

It will be observed that the bill relates back to the laws under which three years' men were enlisted for the bounty to be paid, and to the act of July 11, 1862, for a specific statement as to who shall be enti-The bounty specified in the laws referred to was $200. By the act mentioned the beneficiaries are designated to be: First, the widow, or, if there be none, then to the children in equal proportion, or, if there be no widow or child or children, then to the father, or, it there be no widow or clind or clindren, then to the latter, unless he has abandoned his family, and in that case, or in case of his death, to the mother, or, if there be no father or mother, then to the brothers and sisters; but no bounty is payable to any father, mother, brother, or sister who is not a resident of the United States. Thus, by a reference to these laws it will be seen that the bill is as free from ambiguity as language can make it.

In voting upon this bill on next Monday gentlemen will be apt to be guided by their judgment upon the questions of the cost and of the justice of this measure. Of these I propose briefly to speak, and I shall be glad if gentlemen who honor me with their attention will carry in their minds what I may say until the vote shall be called.

How much this measure will cost the Treasury must depend of course upon the amount and number of bounties to be paid under it; in other words, the number of these short-term soldiers who lost their other words, the number of these short-term soldiers who lost their lives in consequence of the service. Of these no separate or complete record exists. From records which do exist, however, it is possible to ascertain with almost perfect exactness. From official information gathered at the War Department I find that 2.669,823 was the total number of soldiers mustered into the service of the United States, of which 296 were for sixty days, 108,416 were for three months, 85,507 were for one hundred days, 42 were for four months, 20,439 were for six months, 373 were for eight months, and 87,589 were for nine months; making a total of 302,661 men who were enlisted for periods less than one year. No bounty has ever been paid on account of any one of these enlistments, and if any one of this number received a bounty because of another enlistment for a longer period it is expressly pro-vided in the bill that no bounty shall be paid to his heirs. The bill applies only to the heirs of such as have never received any bounty, and not to the 2,367,171 men who enlisted for longer terms, all of whom, if living, or their heirs in case of their death, have received bounties so far as application has been made therefor. With regard to an equalization of bounties among all Union soldiers of every class, I shall have a word to say before I take my seat.

These unbountied soldiers came to the service from all the loyal

States and Territories in about the relative proportions of the respective populations of each. It is safe to assume that the heirs of spective populations of each. It is safe to assume that the heirs of such as fell victims of the war are now scattered throughout these States and Territories in the same ratio. I have, sir, in my hand a tabular statement of the number of less than one year enlistments from each contributing section, from which I will read, so that gentlemen may appreciate now truly the entire portion of the country that stood by the Union is interested in the passage of this bill, even if the higher and broader incentives of gratitude and justice should constitute no motive in its behalf. This is the statement:

It certainly cannot be said that the benefits of this bill will be sec-

We know from the records that 327,588 men lost their lives upon the Union side of the war. As the whole number of enlistments is to the number enlisted for the shorter terms so would be the entire loss to the loss from the short-term classes provided the average term of enlistments were equal. The average term of enlistments was for the shorter-term troops five months and for the longer-term troops thirty-one and one-half months. A calculation from this data shows with something like mathematical accuracy the loss from the shorterterm troops to be 5,894. A very large number of these, however, had served under longer enlistments, for which bounties were given. I estimate that one-fourth should be deducted from this number on that This deduction gives 4,421 as the number of bounties to be account. By no possibility can the number exceed this, and I am confident that it will fall something below it. Thus at $200 each we find that this bill will cost the Treasury $884,200, which, for the sake of the round numbers and a still more liberal estimate, we will call

Now, sir, this is the extreme limit, the outside figure, of what it will cost us to do this act of justice, and the question recurs, can we afford to do it? I have no doubt not only that we can well afford to The sum required do it, but that we cannot well afford not to do it. may look like a large one, but when compared with our yearly appropriations, which for the current fiscal year was something more than $179,000,000, it dwindles into insignificance. We appropriate every year by the million to pay our executive, legislative, and judicial expenditures, to maintain the Army and the Navy, to build fortifications, to improve our rivers and harbors, and to do many other things within the Federal prerogative. Surely somewhere within this large range your Committee on Appropriations can manage by paring down to save the comparatively small sum required to pay these bounties.

Why, sir, you have already saved in the fortification bill alone, comparing the estimates with the appropriation, $3,185,000. For this very marked and proper reduction, thanks to the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] who reported the bill from the committee and whose eloquent utterance upon the occasion of its de-bate, "We want no shotted guns pointing seaward this centennial year," are yet ringing the country round, as expressive of our feel-ing of amity toward all mankind in this proud year of our history. You passed the Military Academy bill with a reduction of $193,828 below the estimates of the War Department. You profess to have saved in the diplomatic and consular bill $429,639, a saving for which saved in the diplomatic and consular bill $429,639, a saving for which I fear the country will have to pay tenfold in the diminution of our foreign trade, which will inevitably result from it. What further reductions will be made I cannot tell. If the pseudo economy—the resort of demagogues—that has governed in some matters would give place to a genuine endeavor to retrench without crippling any useful branch of the public service, a very considerable saving would no doubt be realized. doubt be realized.

It is now well understood that our economists here propose to clip $50 or so from the salaries of soldiers' widows employed in the Departments, meager as those salaries now are. Should that be done, shall the saving be applied toward these bounties, or shall it be used to help on to pay back pensions to rebels who were soldiers in the war of 1812, a proposition discussed here for days past? We shall see which are to be the favored of this House. At any rate it seems to me to be peculiarly fit that of the three millions and more reduction in the fortification bill $900,000, less than one-third, should be set apart to pay these bounties, for thereby you would contribute to the reciprocity of benefits between government and citizen which lies at base of all patriotism, tenfold more valuable to our safety than all the forts that sentinel our coasts and all the iron-clads that ride in our harbors. You may well save it from other appropriations; or, if you will not do this, you can easily realize the sum necessary by a slight change in our revenue laws, which would scarcely be felt. Sir, we are forty millions of people, to whom this sum would be only a little more than two cents per capita. I do not believe—and if I did believe it I should be ashamed to stand here and assert it—that the people are either unable or unwilling to do this act of justice. It is so clear that we can easily do it that, if any man shall try to justify a negative vote upon this bill by the pretense that the condition of the Treasury will not permit, I shall entertain suspicion either of his want of patriotism or of his lack of intelligence respecting our financial condition and resources.

Now, sir, having done with the question of our ability to meet this expenditure, I come to the question of the equity and justice of this measure. It is, sir, a debt that we owe. It is a debt created by every consideration of gratitude, a debt created by the promises made by our people to these soldiers in the past, a debt created by the pledge we seek for the safety of the future.

Should we make a distinction, based upon the terms of enlistment, between the heirs of our dead soldiers for the Union? The soldier who was killed in battle or who died in the hospital lost his life just as surely, and his wife and children were just as truly bereaved of his love and deprived of his labor which gave to them their daily bread whether he was enlisted for sixty days or for three years. If bread whether he was enlisted for sixty days or for three years. It this bill applied to the living instead of the heirs of the dead, perhaps a distinction might be made. As it is, none in justice is possible, for the sacrifice of every dead soldier was equal in magnitude and merit. "Comparisons are odious," and not to be made where each has laid down his life for his country. If, however, sir, the merit of these shorter-term soldiers was in question, what might, nay rather what might not be said without instituting comparisons in rather what might not be said, without instituting comparisons, in truthful praise of their services? It is true that in some instances they were used for garrison duty, to hold the country wrested from the enemy by their comrades of longer culistment, and to guard prisoners of war which they had taken. It is likewise true that they performed valiant and meritorious service upon many of the illustrious fields of the rebellion.

The very first troops that rallied, under the call of President Lincoin of the 15th of April, 1861, and swept down over the border to breast and beat back the waves of southern war that were surging on toward this Capitol, were three months' men. These shorter-term troops when in service were ever found doing their duty wherever placed, standing side by side with their longer-enlisted comrades, equally heroic and daring, amid the fire and smoke and carnage of the battle-field. They sickened in the swamps and beside the sluggish bayous of the South, where a foe more dreaded than their human enemies came upon them, invisible and terrible, on the wings of malarial blasts. They lingered amid the horrors or died of the most damnable tortures in rebel prison-pens. In the heroisms and sacrifices of the war they shared their full part, ever bearing themselves as true and gallant soldiers of the Union.

Side by side with their more favored comrades, their dead now sleep by the waters of many southern rivers; in every national cemetery which your care has provided; in many a yew-shaded northern church-yard, where the tread of their children's feet may brush the dews from the sod which covers them. Let it not be said that their services and sacrifices were not such as to earn their country's gratitude and remembrance. Side by side with the widows and orphans whose lives have been made less desolate by your bounty and care, the widows and orphans of these dead soldiers are now treading their the widows and orphans of these dead soldiers are now treading their sad pathways of life unremembered and unrequited. Is this, sir, the full measure of your gratitude? Why should it not reach out to the one class as well as to the other? He who can distinguish a difference is gifted with a discernment which, thank God, I am denied. That each, from the promptings of gratitude, should be treated with equal generosity and justice I will not, need not, further argue. If your bounty is to be withheld from these still unbountied widows and orphans of the war, we may well blush for the ingratitude and injustice of our country.

But, sir, this is a debt created not alone by sentiments of gratitude. We owe it in fulfillment of pledges that were made when the fate of the country hung upon the doubtful issues of battle. These pledges it is true were embodied in no congressional enactments, were not at-tested by the great seal of our body-politic. They were made by the universal acclaim, they were written in the hearts of our millions, and they are attested by the green sod that blankets the soldier's last bivouac. They are as obligatory upon the nation as the most solemn words of our entire people, uttered in the presence of martyrdom, could make them. Need I say a word in support of what I say? To gentlemen upon this side, whose voices perhaps joined in this universal acclaim, memory stands a witness of its truth. The entire people of the loyal States rose up when the thunders of war were reverberat-ing among the hills and its lightnings were writing in fiery script upon the southern sky a prophecy of doom to the Republic, and gave to the departing soldier of every class the assurance, the solemn assurance, that when the nation should come to make up its jewels the wives and the children of all "the unreturning brave" should be treated with equal justice by a saved and a grateful country. To those in this House upon this side who I know have not forgotten what was said and done when, amid the sobs of women and children, the waving of flags, the music of bands, and the stern adieus of pealing artillery, our gallant volunteers, gathered from homes nestling in valleys, or wind-swept upon hillsides, with the anguish of sundered affection inarticulate in their hearts, side by side there with love of country and trust in countrymen, to make, if needs, a holocaust upon the nation's altar—to those of us here, I say, in whose memories still linger the echos of that fearful past, I need not urge that the nation was pledged as truly as the people could pledge it to do this act of justice.

The sacredness of this pledge must be felt by all from whose memories these scenes have not faded, who recall, as the figment of a startling dream, that in the hour of our country's supremest agony "they builded Him an altar in the evening's dews and damps," and laid thereon the solemn covenant of a people that the blood burdens of the war should earn for all its victims an equality of recompense. So fully, sir, was the force of this pledge felt that while the war was yet going on, although the man who now sits in the White House was drawing nearer day by day to Appomattox, the Thirty-eighth Congress passed an act granting bounties to the heirs of all deceased soldiers, but unfortunately it employed the word "volunteers," which the then Secretary of War held did not comprehend these shorterterm classes, who had been styled militia in the proclamations calling them into the service. The good intentions of that Congress were thus defeated, but the act stands as a recognition of the debt we owe.

thus deteated, but the act stands as a recognition of the debt we owe. Sir, I stated in the early part of my remarks that I should have a word to say with regard to a full equalization of bounties among all the soldiers living as well as among all the heirs of the dead. To do this as soon as practicable, there is an obligation from which the Government cannot with honor escape. The last Congress undertook it, but the bill which had received the assent of both branches fell in the Bottunds through some means that was incomprehensible to one the Rotunda through some means that was incomprehensible to one-half of Congress and a mystery to the whole country. That act would have cost a hundred millions of dollars, and there was intimation that, had it not met its mysterious fate here, it would, on account of the depleted condition of the Treasury, have encountered executive lightning at the other end of the Avenue. That act, however, was right, and I hope to live to see it the law, for by it alone can be redeemed in full the solemn pledge of the American people made to

Mr. Speaker, we have heard much said here and outside of this hall of the sacredness of national honor, of the inviolability of the public faith. He is, indeed, no friend to his country who favors her dishonor, and he who would break the public faith is a public enemy and ought to be treated as such. With this truth in mind, I want to call the attention of gentlemen, and especially of gentlemen who represent the money centers, to an exhibition with which we are con-

The war cast upon the country two kinds of burdens—a burden of money and a burden of blood. These created two classes of obligations which it will be dishonor not to recognize and a breach of faith The money burden was taken up in the first instance by men favored of fortune and strangers to the hardships of life. The blood burden was borne chiefly by those whose only wealth was their toil and in whose sweat their wives and children eat their daily bread. One class risked of their wealth a part. The other endured the toil and the weariness, offering all they had, even the Almighty's good gift of life, to the country. The one brought to the nation's altar money to be repaid, the other blood which can never be gathered up. The act of our money creditor was patriotic, but the contribution of the soldier to the common weal was as much greater as eternity is vaster than time, or as the illimitable universe of God is greater than the little mote that dances in the golden glance of an autumn sunset

To each our faith was pledged, for full and honest payment to one, and an equality of bounties and pensions and the nation's eternal gratitude to the other. Now, sir, contemplating this, would we not expect the claim of the soldiers to receive equal if not the first consideration? Instead of this, however—and this is the exhibition to sideration? Instead of this, however—and this is the exhibition to which I desire to call attention—we see men here passing sleepless nights and feverish days in the intensity of their anxiety in the interests of the men who loaned us money, claiming to be actuated by a tender sense of national honor, but who turn cold, if not openly hostile, straightway when the claim of the soldier is mentioned. Why is this? Is, then, the gold of the affluent risked but not lost, greater in the eyes of these men than the red blood of our bravest and best which stained the fields of our victories? Was the merit in risking money so much greater than that of the sacrifice of life that risking money so much greater than that of the sacrifice of life, that our faith to the holders of our bonds is more sacred than to the stout yeomanry who fought our battles?

Ah, sir, as everything has its philosophy, so has this conduct of an, sir, as everything has its philosophy, so has this conduct of these men. Sidney Smith, in a moment of cynicism, once said that "gratitude is a lively appreciation of benefits expected." I fear that an alert and powerful money interest, an interest with immense re-source to control the political fortunes of men, awakens in the bosoms of these gentlemen emotions of this sort of gratitude, which the interests of the humble widows and orphans of the war are too feeble to arouse. I would not that they should be less earnest in asserting the importance of unimpeached national honor with the public credtior, but I would have them adorned with the jewel of consistency which would not exclude those who have sacrificed so much for the country from sharing in the benefits of an unbroken public faith. The votes of these men upon this question will be watched not only by the soldiers but by the whole people of the country, who desire justice no less for the soldier than for the public ereditor.

I believe that the country is determined that its faith shall be kept whenever pledged. Deep down beneath the sea of popular opinion, the surface of which ruffles in every breeze or dashes in every storm, there is an unalterable determination, resistless as the undertow of the Atlantic, that every promise of the war is to be redeemed, whether made by the nation as a body-politic, or by the masses of the people who are the nation.

But, sir, the reasons for this bill do not all come from the past. The future contributes an argument. Of this I hinted when mentioning the fortification bill. We ought to do this act of justice to render more secure the future of our country. Sir, history illustrates that as it is-

Not high raised battlements or labored mound, Thick wall or moated gate; Not cities tall with spires and turrets crowned; Not bays and broad-armed ports Where, laughing at the storm, rich navies ride—that constitute a state, so it is not the shotted guns pointing seaward, the fortified headlands, the lines of forts, the ships of war, or the squadrons of a standing army that constitute the real safety of a nation. The best bulwarks of our country are not these, but are and must ever be the patriotism and the valor of our people. When war comes, should war ever come again, whether we shall be assailed by foes from without or enemies from within, our best defense must be the citizen-soldier. Not so much to our works of defense, to the arts taught within the academic shades of our military schools, to the tinseled martinets of theoretic war will we then look as to his fidelity and daring. Upon him may we ever rely. Whenever danger appears, his legions will be found battalioned, the "old gnard" of our liberties and of our institutions. Within his heart courage and patriotism, the twin angels of our safety, sleep. As I have once before said, a complete reciprocity of no confidence between government and citizen lies at the base of all patriotism. How important then that we do not alienate the confidence of the citizen-soldier by laying at his feet a broken pledge, and the token of an ungrateful country. Thus, sir, the future as well as the past, the one full of hope and the other rich with memories, each contributes its argument for justice to the widows and orphans of the war.

Now, sir, unless I have mistaken the logic of facts, it stands demonstrated, first, that without adding to the public burden we may bounty these unbountied victims of the war, and, second, that it is a debt due to them; a solemn debt, made so by gratitude, by promise, and by precaution; a debt which to ignore would be dishonor. What more remains to be said? I cannot, of course, hope that in this House, where sit sixty-one ex-officers of the confederate service by the side of nineteen who served in the Union Army, what I have said of the promises that were made by the northern people in the dark years which began the last decade will be appreciated, for with so many my words are unenforced by the voice of memory. I am encouraged, however, by the noble words that have been spoken from time to time from the other side, upon the merit of the Union soldier, by the tokens that have been given that the enmities of the past are dead in the bosoms where they once rankled, that when the roll shall dead in the bosoms where they once rankled, that when the roll shall be called upon this bill the ayes will not all come from this side of the House. If the frequent protestations that we have heard here that the palmetto has become the olive-branch; that respect for the Union soldier and fidelity to the cause for which he fought now predominate in the hearts of his late foemen are not mere hypocrasies, I have the right to hope that, as the blue and the gray fraternized on the 19th of June under the shadow of Bunker Hill monument, so gentlemen upon both sides will join hands to do this act of justice. If the ex-confederate be sincere in what he has professed, he will be swift to honor the claim of the widow and orphans of him whose manhood he recognized in the shock of battle, whose cause he now admits to have been just, and who, if living, would be his countryman, his compatriot, and his brother now.

To all gentlemen of this House, without respect to party or section, do I appeal, by their estimate of the sacredness of the pledged honor of our people, by their sense of the honorable sentiments of gratitude, by their hopes for an assured national future, to take this first step toward complete justice to those to whose valor and sacrifices we are indebted for the blessings of a re-united country and of free government which we all enjoy.

Sir, I close as I began by again notifying the House that upon Monday next, or as soon thereafter as I can obtain the floor for that purpose, I shall put this bill upon its passage under a suspension of

The SPEAKER having resumed the chair,
Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I move that the House adjourn.
The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at two o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

Monday, March 6, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Byron Sunderland, D. D. The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pub-

A bill (H. R. No. 236) to give the consent of the United States to the appropriation of certain proceeds arising from the sale of the swamp and overflowed lands in Alabama for the purpose of furnishing other and additional accommodations for the indigent, insane, and idiotic persons resident in said State;
A bill (H. R. No. 280) to amend the act entitled "An act to appropriate lands for the support of schools in certain townships and frac-tional townships not before provided for," approved May 20, 1826;

A bill (H. R. No. 1752) to restore certain lands in the State of Iowa to settlement under the homestead law, and for other purposes; A bill (H. R. No. 2039) to amend section 2450 and 2451, and to repeal section 2452, title 32, chapter 11, of the Revised Statutes;

A bill (H. R. No. 2427) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend an act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies," approved March 13, 1874; and
A bill (H. R. No. 2452) to extend the time to pre-emptors on the public lands

The bill (H. R. No. 1771) to declare forfeited to the United States certain lands granted to the State of Kansas in aid of the construction of railroads by act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting information in connection with Senate bill No. 144, to provide for the construction of a telegraph line from Fort Canby, via Fort Stevens and Astoria, to Portland, Oregon; which, on motion of Mr. MITCHELL, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WINDOM presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of the passage of an act for the relief of settlers upon certain lands in the State of Minnesota; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas large numbers of citizens of this State have in good faith settled upon and made or acquired valuable improvements on tracts of land included within the granted and indemnity limits of the lands granted to the Brainard and Saint Vincent branches or extensions of the Saint Paul and Pacific Railroad Company, and are unable under existing laws to perfect title thereto; and whereas justice demands that these citizens should be protected in their homes and property so made and acquired, and the material interests of a large and deserving class secured and preserved: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives, (the senate concurring.) That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use all honorable means in their power to procure at the earliest possible time the passage of by Congress a law which will allow such persons or their representatives to secure and perfect title

J. B. WAKEFIELD,
President of the Senate.
W. R. KINYON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Approved February 24, 1876.

STATE ON MINNESOTA,
Office of Secretary of State:

I certify the foregoing to be a true and correct copy of the original on file in this office.

Witness my hand and the great seal of the State this 2d day of March, A. D.

J. S. IRGENS, Secretary of State.

Mr. WINDOM presented a petition of 1,010 citizens of Wisconsin, praying for an appropriation by Congress to complete the Fox River improvement and for the construction of a canal along the Wisconsin River from Portage City to Prairie du Chien, Wisconsin, in accordance with the third plan recommended by General Warren; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of the speedy construction on the part of the General Government of a double-track freight railway extending from one or more of the principal cities of the East westwardly to the Missouri River, with a branch extending into the great producing region of Minnesota, such railway to be under the control and management of the United States and transportation charges thereon so regulated as to cover only operating expenses; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented a memorial of the Legis-Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, praying for the establishment of a tri-weekly mail-route from Marquette, in the county of Green Lake, via Kingston, to Portage, in Columbia County; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present the petition of Walter Pearce, praying compensation for services performed in registration in North Carolina. This potition was not be fortified with the times with

This petition may not be fortified with that impregnable proof which generally accompanies claims upon the Government; but I think that this poor fellow is entitled to something, and I commit his claim to the Committee on Claims with that unfaltering confidence which is inspired by the touching evidences which we have so often had of its liberality.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KEY presented the petition of Nathaniel W. Hayes, of Bradley County, Tennessee, praying compensation for stores and supplies to the amount of $1,542.50 taken by the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONKLING. I present resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, relative to the bankrupt law. These resolutions are instructive, pointing out respects in which the Chamber of Commerce think the law ought to be improved. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also a memorial signed by George C.
Richardson & Co. and four hundred and odd other merchants of the city of New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law, pointing out changes which the memorialists think should be and saying that some of them having signed a petition for the mate, and saying that some of them having signed a petition for the unqualified repeal of the law they wish it to be understood that their remonstrance is against the law as it now exists and not against such a law as they think it could and might be made. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, touching the shipping act of the United States, commending the commissioners and commending the law, and remonstrating against the retransfer of the control of its provisions from the United States circuit courts to the Treasury Department. I move the reference of these resolutions to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARVEY presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, in relation to the existing treaty of August 17, 1866, between the United States and the Cherokee Indians, and in favor of the appointment of new commissioners thereunder to re-appraise certain lands ceded thereby so as to enable settlers thereon to purchase the same at their appraised value; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of the amendment of the existing timber-culture act; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, relating to lands of the Kansas Pacific Railway Company, and the right to tax the same; which was referred to the Committee on Public

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, memorializing Congress in behalf of certain citizens, settlers upon the public lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WITHERS presented a petition of citizens of Lynchburgh, Virginia, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WEST presented the petition of citizens of New Orleans, Louisiana, praying for an amendment of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BOGY presented a resolution of the Legislature of Missouri, in favor of granting pensions to soldiers of the Mexican war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. NORWOOD presented the petition of A. C. Rhind, captain United States Navy, praying to be restored to his proper position on the active list of captains in the Navy, next below Commodore A. K. Hughes, and over Captains E. R. Colhoun, C. H. Baldwin, and R. W. Shufeldt, for reasons set forth in the petition; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN presented two petitions of business men of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition signed by citizens of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying for the continuance and amendment of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DENNIS presented a petition of citizens of Cecil County, Maryand, praying an appropriation for the completion of the improvements to the navigation of the Northeast River to the town of Northeast, in Maryland; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McMILLAN presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of the establishment of a post-route from Smith

Lake, Minnesota via Abson's Crossing, to Normand post-office, Wright County, Minnesota; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Iowa in relation to a modification of the homestead law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the United States land offices as at present established in this State are remote from a large portion of the lands now held under homestead claims; and whereas the homestead laws, as construed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, require the settler to appear at the land office of his district in person to submit his final homestead proof; and whereas said requirement causes great and unnecessary expense to the settlers and subserves no good purpose: Therefore, Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iova, That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives be requested to secure such an amendment to the homestead laws as shall allow the homestead settler to make his final proof before the clerk of the court of the county in which the land is located.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be instructed to forward as soon as practicable a copy of this resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of citizens of Western Idaho and Eastern Oregon, praying for the establishment of a mail route between Salubria, in Western Idaho, and Sparta, in Eastern Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. DORSEY presented a petition of business men of Arkanasa, praying as a matter of justice that Congress aid in the construction of the Texas and Pacific Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. ALCORN presented the petition of John G. Owen, of Scott County, Mississipp i, praying for compensation for services performed as mail contractor prior to 1861; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of citizens of Mississippi, praying for the establishment of a new mail route from Augusta, Perry County, to State Line Station, Green County, Mississippi; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented additional papers to accompany the bill (S. No. 282) authorizing the Harrison Harbor Company to excavate a channel and harbor in Mississippi Sound, and to construct docks and break-waters in connection therewith; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SARGENT presented the petitions of Caroline Snell and Joshua H. Walcott, showing that, on their trip across the plains in 1864, they were depredated upon by certain bands of Indians, and praying that they may receive compensation for the property then taken and destroyed by those Indians from the annuities of the tribes; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SARGENT. I also present the petition of makers of cigarettes and merchants of San Francisco, protesting against the passage of the bill, now pending, I believe, before the other House, raising the tax upon the manufacture of cigarettes, and proposing a plan by which the revenue may be increased and fraudulent manufacture prevented. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ENGLISH presented a petition of 100 citizens of Norwalk, Connecticut, praying for the repeal of the two-cent United States stamp-tax on bank-checks; which was referred to the Committee on

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented a memorial of manufacturers, mechanics, and citizens engaged in all branches of productive industry in Delaware County, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the passage of any act reducing the duties on imported articles that enter into competition with American manufactures; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the bill (H. R. No. 1595) for the relief of John T. Burchell, of Knoxville, Tennessee, for services rendered the Government in a small-pox hospital, with the petition and accompanying papers, have had the same under consideration, and find that this bill was in the hands of same under consideration, and find that this bill was in the hands of the Committee on Military Affairs at the last session and also at the previous session of Congress, and that that committee made a report on the bill and papers. The Committee on Claims ask to be discharged and that the papers and bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am also directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the petition and papers of Thomas H. Coates, of Raleigh, North Carolina, for a reconsideration and allowance of his claim (No. 9056) for property taken for the use of the armies of the United States, to report adversely. I call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] to this case. This claim was reported upon by the committee on the 15th of December adversely. Since that time there has been additional testimony presented in committee and the case has been again considered, and the committee still feel constrained to report against the allowance. They therefore report adversely to the claim and ask that it be disallowed, and that this conclusion be concurred in by the Senate.

The report was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. The same committee, to whom were referred the petition and papers of Charles M. Briggs, of Kentucky, praying that his claim for the proceeds of certain cotton taken from him in the State of Mississippi by United States troops, in 1863, be referred to the Court of Claims, have had the same under consideration, and find that this petition, together with a bill, was before the Judiciary Committee at the last Congress, or the preceding Congress, and the recommendation of that committee was that the bill be indefinitely postponed, and that report was concurred in by the Senate. For that reason your committee now report it back, and ask that the claim be disallowed. I move that the report be concurred in.

The report was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Arthur Middleton Blake, praying compensation for property taken and destroyed by the United States military and naval forces during the late war to the amount of about $400,000, submitted an adverse report; which was agreed to.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 83) for the relief of James A. Hile, of Lewis County, Missouri, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Benjamin L. Cornish, praying for pay as second lieutenant of the Thirty-second Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry from November, 1864 to June 11, 1865, submitted a report thereon accompanied by a bill (S. No. 560) for the relief of Benjamin L. Cornish, late second lieutenant of the Thirty-second Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Major Junius T. Turner, of Washington, District of Columbia, late captain in the Third Regiment of Maryland Cavalry Volunteers, praying the payment of a sum of money equal to the travel-pay of a captain of volunteers from Washington, District of Columbia, to San Francisco, California, reported a bill (S. No. 561) for the relief of Major Junius T. Turner; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 111) for the relief of John Montgomery and Thomas E. Williams, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indennitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Alexander Montgomery, lieutenant-colonel United States Army, praying compensation for services as major in the Army from July 24, 1863, to June 14, 1864, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that the petition, together with the report of the subcommittee thereon, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs;

which was agreed to.

Wr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 294) for the relief of Charles E. Hedges, have had the same under consideration, and they report that the claim is meritorious, and that it should be paid out of the funds and annuities belonging to the Yankton Indians; but not knowing at what time or in what amounts the payment should be made, I move that the report of the committee and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and that the report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Charles H. Hubbard, administrator of Joseph S. Hubbard, deceased, praying compensation for ninety-four hogsheads of sugar taken by authority of the United States, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. CAPPETON from the Committee on Claims to whom was re-

Mr. CAPERTON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of James J. Ritch, of Scott County, Mississippi, praying compensation for property and supplies taken by the United States Army in 1864, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the me-morial of John Russell, of Warren County, Mississippi, alleging that the southern claims commission decided adversely to his claim against the United States by confounding him with another person, against the United States by combining him with another person, and praying that his claim may be re-referred to the commission, or that Congress may grant him relief, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of John E. Woodward, of Kentucky, praying to have certain moneys refunded to him out of the United States Treasury, being the proceeds of the sale of tobacco seized by order of General Paine, commanding the United States forces at Paducah, Kentucky, belonging to S. Fels, and for the amount of which judgment was rendered against Woodward and afterward paid by him, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the select committee to whom was referred the message of the House of Representatives respecting the impeachment of William W. Belknap to report a preamble and resolution, and I ask for their present consideration. This is a mere formality as the next step in the orderly progress of the affair, according to the precedents.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to,

as follows:

Whereas the House of Representatives on the 3d day of March, 1876, by five of its members, Messrs. CLYMER, ROBENS, BLACKBURN, BASS, and DANFORD at the bar of the Senate, impeached William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, of high crimes and misdemeanors, and informed the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him and make good the same; and likewise demanded that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said William W. Belknap to answer the said impeachment: Therefore fore,

Ordered, That the Senate will, according to its standing rules and orders in such cases provided, take proper order thereon, (upon the presentation of articles of impeachment,) of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives herewith.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 562) for the relief of Joseph E. Moore; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 563) to provide for the sale of extra copies of public documents, and for the distribution of the regular official editions thereof; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 564) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and the several acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COOPER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 565) for the relief of the heirs of Matthew Alliger deceared which property which the print the state of the second which we have the state of the second which we have the second which we h

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 567) to establish a postroute in Wisconsin; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EATON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 568) authorizing the payment of prize-money to officers of the Farragut fleet for the destruction of enemies' vessels in April 1862; which was read twice by its title, and together sels in April, 1862; which was read twice by its title, and, together with an accompanying letter from the Treasury Department, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WALLACE, it was Ordered, That Henry C. Watterson have leave to withdraw his memorial and papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. WITHERS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of John Y. Worthington be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred, with the additional evidence now presented, to the Committee on Claims.

BIDS FOR CARRYING THE MAIL.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Postmaster-General be requested to furnish the Senate with any information which he may have touching the submission of straw bids or probable worthless or fraudulent bids for conveying the mails of the United States in the several States in which advertisements for mail proposals appeared October 1, 1875, and that said information and all evidence in his possession be furnished before awards shall be made on said bids.

INDIAN BUREAU EXPENDITURES.

Mr. MAXEY. I offer a resolution and ask its present consideration. The object I have in view is that there may be and most likely will be a bill introduced for the transfer of the Indian Bureau from the Interior Department to the War Department; and I desire to ascertain the expenditures under these two managements.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to,

as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish for the information of the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, a statement showing the annual expenditures of the Indian Bureau since its organization to the present time, and also the number of Indians provided for at the expense of the Government each year since the organization of said Indian Bureau. tion of said Indian Bureau.

COTTON CULTURE IN THE STATES.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby instructed to furnish to the Senate, from such data as are now in the possession of his Department, the following information: What are the geographical limits and area within the United States the soil and climate of which are adapted to the cultivation and growth of the stock and fiber of the sea island or long-staple cotton, and in which said cotton matures a perfect growth; also, the geographical limits and area in each of the several States the soil and climate of which are adapted to the cultivation and growth of said cotton, and in which said cotton matures a perfect growth of they and stock. of tiber and stock.

THE PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. WEST. I desire to give notice to the Senate that on Wednesday next, at the conclusion of the morning business, I shall ask the Senate to take from its table the communication from the Secretary of the Treasury under date of February 3, 1876, embodied in Senate Executive Document No. 25, with a view to a motion for its reference. I shall also ask the indulgence of the Senate to enable me to submit some remarks in that connection if it suits their convenience on Wednesday

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is already a special order for Wednesday next at that hour, the Chair will remind the Senator.

Mr. WEST. I am so apprised; but that occurs at the expiration of the morning hour, and if there is not sufficient time I shall ask the Senator in charge of the New Mexico bill to allow me to encroach for a short period on his time, subject of course to the pleasure of the Senate then.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SAINT LOUIS.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is no further morning business, I move

Mr. SHEMAN. If there is no further morning business, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the question of reference of the resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of New York.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 2270) to provide for the purchase of material for the continuation of the work on the building for custom-house and post-office at Saint Louis, Missouri, was passed; and I desire to say that if the motion to reconsider prevails, I shall propose two amendments to the bill, which I think will be acceptable, and which will remove the objection I had to its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield for that purpose?

Mr. BOUTWELL. It will give rise to no debate. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. Bogy] has been consulted about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which House bill No. 2270 was passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading, in order that amendments may be offered.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to amend the bill by inserting after the word "material," in line 14, "as is not needed for the performance of the contract herein authorized, and;" and at the end of the proviso to insert:

And provided further, that the contracts herein authorized to be made shall not in the aggregate exceed the sum of $75,000.

So that if amended the proviso will read-

Provided, That said Architect may, in his discretion, use such portion of said sum hereby appropriated for labor and material as is not needed for the performance of the contracts herein authorized, and as may be absolutely necessary for the proper preservation and progress of said building: And provided further, That the contracts herein authorized to be made shall not in the aggregate exceed the sum of

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL FINANCES-SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the motion to refer the resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, relative to the national finances and in favor of the resumption of specie payments at the time now provided by law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate proceed to consider the motion to refer the resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of New York.

The motion was agreed to.

OUGHT THE RESUMPTION ACT OF 1875 BE REPEALED?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have taken the unusual course of arresting the reference to the Committee of Finance of the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New York in order to discuss in an impersonal and non-partisan way one of the questions presented by that memorial, and one which now fills the public mind and must necessarily soon occupy our attention. That question is, "Ought the resumption act of 1875 be repealed?" The memorial strongly opposes such repeal, while other memorials, and notably those from the Boards of Trade of New York and Toledo, advocate it. These opposing views are supported in each House of Congress, and will, when our time is more occupied than now, demand our vote.

And, sir, we are forced to consider this question when the law it is proposed to repeal is only commanding to appear to the proposed to repeal is only commanding to appear to the proposed to the second of the proposed to repeal is only commanding to appear to the proposed to repeal is only commanding to appear to the proposed to the p

And, sir, we are forced to consider this question when the law it is proposed to repeal is only commencing to operate, now, three years before it can have full effect—during all which time its operation will be under your eye and within your power—and while the passions of men are heated by a presidential combat, when a grave question, affecting the interests of every citizen of the United States, will be influenced by motives entirely foreign to the merits of the proposition.

QUESTIONS NOT INVOLVED.

And the question presented is not as to the best means of securing the resumption of a specie standard, but solely whether the only measare that promises that result shall be repealed. We know there is a wide and honest diversity of opinion as to the agency and means to secure a specie standard. When any practicable scheme to that end is proposed I am ready to examine it on its merits; but we are not considering the best mode of doing the thing, but whether we will recede from the promise made by the law as it stands as well as refuse all means to execute that promise. If the law is deficient in any respect it is open to amendment. If the powers vested in the Secretary are not sufficient or you wish to limit or enlarge them, he is your servant, and you have but to speak and he obeys. It is not whether we will accumulate gold or greenbacks or convert our notes into bonds, nor whether the time to resume is too early or too late. All these are subjects of legislation. But the question now is whether we will repudiate the legislative declaration made in the act of 1875 to redeem the promise made and printed on the face of every United States note, a promise made in the midst of war, when our nation was struggling for existence, a promise renewed in March, 1869, in the most unequivocal language, and finally made specific as to time by the act of 1875.

And let us not deceive ourselves by supposing that those who op pose this repeal are in favor of a purely metallic currency to the exclusion of paper currency, for all intelligent men agree that every great commercial nation must have both: the one as the standard of value by which all things are measured, which daily measures your of value by which all things are measured, which daily measures your bonds and notes as it measures wheat, cotton, and land; and also a paper or credit currency, which, from its convenience of handling or transfer, must be the medium of exchanges in the great body of the business of life. Statistics show that in commercial countries a very large proportion of all transfers is by book-accounts and notes, and more than nine-tenths of all the residue of payments is by checks, drafts, and such paper tools of exchange. Of the vast by checks, drafts, and such paper tools of exchange. Of the vast business done in New York and London not 5 per cent. is done with either paper money or gold or silver, but by the mere balancing of accounts or exchange of credits. And this will be so whether your paper money is worth 40 per cent. or 100 per cent. in gold. The only paper money is worth 40 per cent. or 100 per cent. In gold. The only question is whether in using paper money we will have that which is as good as it promises, as good as that of Great Britain, France, or Germany; as good as coin issued from your mints, or whether we will content ourselves with depreciated paper money, worth 10 per cent less than it promises, every dollar of which daily tells your constituents that the United States is not rich enough to pay more than 90 per cent. on the dollar for its three hundred and seventy millions of promises to pay, or that you have not courage enough to stand by your promise to do it.

Nor are we to decide whether our paper money shall be issued directly by the Government or by banks created by the Government; nor whether at a future time the legal-tender quality of United States notes shall continue. I am one of those who believe that a United States note issued directly by the Government and convertible on demand into gold coin, or a Government bond equal in value to gold, is the best currency we can adopt; that it is to be the currency of the future, not only in the United States, but in Great Britain as well; and that such a currency might properly continue to be a legal tender except when coin is specifically stipulated for.

But these are not the questions we are to deal with. It is whether the promise of the law shall be fulfilled, that the United States shall pay such of its notes as are presented on and after the 1st day of January, 1879, in coin; and whether the national banks will at the same time redeem their notes either in coin or United States notes made equal to coin; or whether the United States shall revoke its promise and continue for an indefinite period to still longer force upon the people a depreciated currency always below the legal standard of gold, and fluctuating daily in its depreciation as Congress may threaten or promise, or speculators may hoard, or corner, or throw out your broken promises. It is the turning point in our financial history, which will greatly affect the life of individuals and the fate of parties, but, more than all, the honor and good faith of our country.

At the beginning of our national existence our ancestors boldly and hopefully assumed the burden of a great national debt, formed of the debts of the old confederation and of the States that composed it; and, with a scattered population and feeble resources, honestly met and paid in good solid coin every obligation. After the war of 1812, which exhausted our resources, destroyed our commerce, and greatly which exhausted our resources, destroyed our commerce, and greatly increased our debt, a republican administration boldly funded our debt, placed its currency upon the coin basis, promptly paid its interest, and reduced the principal; and within twenty years after that war was over, under the first democratic President, paid in coin the last dollar, both principal and interest, of the debt. And now, eleven years after a greater war, of grander proportions, in which not merely foreign domination threatened us, but the very existence of our nation was at stake, and after our cause has been blessed with unexampled success, with a country teeming with wealth, with our credit count was at stake, and after our cause has been blessed with unexampled success, with a country teeming with wealth, with our credit equal to that of any nation, we are debating whether we will redeem our promises according to their legal tenor and effect, or whether we will refuse to do so and repeal and cancel them.

I would invoke in the consideration of this question the example of those who won our independence and preserved it to us, to inspire us so to decide this question that those who come after us may point to our example of standing by the public faith now solemnly pledged, even though to do so may not run current with the temporary pressure of the hour or may entail some sacrifice and hardship.

THE VITAL OBJECT OF THE ACT OF 1875.

What then is the law it is proposed to repeal? I will state its provisions fully in detail, but the main proposition—the essential core of the whole—is the promise to which the public faith is pledged that the United States will redeem in gold coin any of its notes that may be presented to the Treasury on and after the 1st day of January, 1879. This is the vital object of the law. It does not undertake to settle the nature of our paper money after that, whether it shall be reissued again, whether it shall thereafter be a legal tender, nor whether it shall not supersede bank-notes. All this is purely that the state of the control of th posely left to the future. But it does say that on and after that day the United States note promising to pay one dollar shall be equal to the gold dollar of the Mint.  $\dot{}$

The questions then arise

First. Ought this promise be performed?

Second. Can we perform it?

Third. Are the agencies and measures prescribed in the law suf-

Fourth. If not, what additional measures should be enacted?

Let us consider these questions in their order with all serious deliberation that their conceded importance demands.

And first, ought this promise be fulfilled?

THE LEGAL PURPORT OF UNITED STATES NOTES.

To answer this we must fully understand the legal and moral obligations contained in the notes of the United States. The purport of the note is as follows:

The United States promises to pay the bearer one dollar.

This note is a promise to pay one dollar. The legal effect of this note has been announced by the unanimous opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, the highest and final judicial authority in our Government.

The legal-tender attribute given to the note has been the subject of conflicting decisions in that court, but the nature and purport of it is not only plain on its face, but is concurred in by every judge of that court and by every judicial tribunal before which that question has been presented.

In the case of Bank vs. Supervisors, 7 Wallace, 31, Chief Justice

Chase says:

But, on the other hand, it is equally clear that these notes are obligations of the United States. Their name imports obligation. Every one of them expresses upon its face an engagement of the nation to pay to the bearer a certain sum. The dollar note is an engagement to pay a dollar, and the dollar intended is the coined dollar of the U<sub>i</sub> ited States, a certain quantity in weight and fineness of gold or silver, authenticated as such by the stamp of the Government. No other dollars had before been recognized by the legislation of the National Government as lawful maney.

Again, in the case of Bronson vs. Rhodes, 7 Wallace, 251, Chief Justice Chase says:

The note dollar was the promise to pay a coined dollar.

In the Legal-Tender Cases, 12 Wallace, 560, Justice Bradley says:

It is not an attempt to coin money out of a valueless material, like the coinage of leather, or ivory, or cowry shells. It is a pleage of the national credit. It is a promise by the Government to pay dollars; it is not an attempt to make dollars. The standard of value is not changed. The Government simply demands that its credit shall be accepted and received by public and private creditors during the pending exigency.

Its create shall be accepted and received by public and private creators during the pending exigency. * * *

No one supposes that these Government certificates are never to be paid; that the day of specie payments is never to return. And it matters not in what form they are issued. * * * Through whatever changes they pass, their ultimate destiny is to be paid.

In all these legal-tender cases there is not a word in conflict with these opinions.

Thus, then, it is settled that this note is not a dollar, but a debt due; a promise to pay a dollar in gold coin. Congress may define the weight and fineness of a dollar, and it has done so by providing a gold coin weighing  $25^{8}_{10}$  grains of standard gold  $^{9}_{10}$  fine. The promise is specific and exact, and its nature is fixed by the law and announced by the court. Here I might rest as to the nature of the United States note; but it is proper that I state the law under which it was issued note; but it is proper that I state the law under which it was issued and the subsequent laws relating to it.

The act of February 25, 1862, gave birth to this note as well as the whole financial policy of the war. The first section of that act authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue upon the credit of the United States, United States notes to the amount of $150,000,000, payable to bearer at the Treasury of the United States. The amount of these notes was subsequently increased during the war to the maximum sum of $450,000,000, but the nature and character of the notes was the same as the first issue. The calcargement of the issue did not was the same as the first issue. The enlargement of the issue did not in the least affect the obligation of the United States to pay them in coin. This obligation was recognized in every loan law passed during the war; and to secure the note from depreciation the amount was carefully limited, and every quality was given to it to maintain its value that was possible during the exigencies of the war. I might show you from the contemporaneous debates in Congress that at every step of the war the notes were regarded as a temporary loan, in the step of the war the notes were regarded as a temporary loan, in the nature of a forced loan, but a loan cheerfully borne, and to be redeemed soon after the war was over. It was not until two years after the war, when the advancing value of the note created an interest to depreciate it in order to advance prices for purposes of speculation, that there was any talk about putting off the payment of the note. The policy of a gradual contraction of the currency with a view to specie payments was in December, 1865, concurred in by the almost unanimous vote of the House of Representatives, and the act of April 12, 1866, authorized $4,000,000 of notes a month to be retired and canceled. No one then questioned either the policy, the duty, or the obligation of the United States to redeem these notes in

WHY THE UNITED STATES NOTE IS BELOW PAR.

Why has not this obligation been performed? How comes it that fourteen years after these notes were issued, and eleven years after the exigency was over, we are debating whether they shall be paid and when they shall be paid? We may well pause to examine how this plain and positive obligation has so long been deferred by a nation always sensitive to the public honor.

The fatal commencement of this long delay was in this provision of the act approved March 3, 1863, as follows:

And the holders of United States notes issued under and by virtue of said acts shall present the same for the purpose of exchanging the same for bonds as therein provided on or before the 1st day of July, 1863, and thereafter the right so to exchange the same shall cease and determine.

Thus, under the pressure of war and the plausible pretext of a statnte of limitations, the most essential legal attribute of the note was taken away. This act, though convenient in its temporary results, was a most fatal step, and for my part in acquiescing in and voting for it I have felt more regret than for any act of my official life. But it must be remembered that the object of this provision was not to prevent the conversion of notes into bonds, but to induce their conversion. It was the policy and need of the Government to induce its citizens to exchange the notes freely for the bonds, so that the notes might again be paid out to meet the pressing demands of the war. might again be paid out to meet the pressing demands of the war. It was believed that if this right to convert them was limited, in time this would cause them to be more freely funded; and Mr. Chase, then Secretary of the Treasury, anxious to prevent a too large increase of the interest of the public debt, desired to place in market a 5 per cent. bond instead of a 6 per cent. bond. The fatal error was in not changing the right to convert the note into a 5 per cent. bond instead of a 6 per cent. bond. This was in fact proposed in the Committee on Finance, but it was said that a right to convert a note into a bond at any time was not so likely to be exercised as if it could only be exat any time was not so likely to be exercised as if it could only be exercised at the pleasure of the Government. And this plausible theory to induce the conversion of notes into bonds was made the basis after the war was over for the refusal of the United States to allow the conversion of its notes into bonds, and has been the fruitful cause of the continued depreciation and dishonor of United States notes for the last five years, during which our 5 per cent. bonds have been at par with gold, while our notes rise and fall in the gamut of depreci-Notwithstanding that the right to convert notes into bonds was taken away, yet in fact they were during the war received par for par for bonds; and after the war was over all the interest-bearing securities were converted into bonds; but the notes—the money of the people-the artificial measure of value, the most sacred obligation, because it was past due, was refused either payment or conversion, thus cutting it off from the full benefit of the advancing credit of the Government, and leaving to it only the forced quality of legal tender in payment of debts.

Shortly after the war was over, and notably during the presidential campaign of 1868, the question arose whether the bonds of the United States were payable in coin or United States notes. Both notes and bonds were then below par in coin, the notes ranging from notes and bonds were then below par in coin, the notes ranging from sixty-seven to seventy-five cents in coin; and 5 per cent. bonds from seventy-two to eighty cents in coin. Here again the opportunity was lost to secure the easy and natural appreciation of our notes to the gold standard. Had Congress then authorized the conversion of notes into bonds when both were depreciated both would have advanced to par in gold; but on the one hand it was nrged that this would cause a rapid contraction, and on the other that the right to convert the note into a bond was not specie payment; it was only the exchange of one promise for another. It was specie payment they very much favored, but did not have the wisdom then to secure. If the advocates for specie payment had then supported a restoration of the right to convert notes into bonds they would have secured their object with but little opposition. But all measures to fund the notes at the pleasure of the holder were defeated, and instead there was ingrafted into the act to strengthen the public credit—

First, a declaration "that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin, or its equivalent, of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States" except such as by the law could be paid in other currency than gold and silver.

Second, "and the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision, at the earliest practicable period, for the redemp-tion of the United States notes in coin."

Here again the obligation of the Government to pay these notes in coin was recognized, its purpose declared, and the time fixed, "as early as practicable." What was the effect of this important act of Congress? Without adding one dollar to the public debt, or the burden of the debt, both bonds and notes rose in value. Within one year the bonds rose to par in gold, making it practicable to commence the refunding of 6 per cent. bonds into 5 per cent bonds. The notes rose under the stimulus of this new promise in one year from seventy-six cents to eighty-nine cents in gold, but no steps whatever were made to redeem them.

The amount of bank-notes authorized was increased fifty-four millions. The executive department pursued the policy of redeeming debts not due, and did from an overflowing Treasury reduce very largely the public debt, but no steps whatever were taken to advance the value of our notes. The effect of the act of 1869 was exhausted on the adjournment of Congress in March, 1870, when the United States notes were worth eighty-nine cents in gold; and thereabouts, up and down, with many fluctuations, they have remained to this day. The bondholder, secure in the promise to him, is happy in receiving his interest in gold, with his bond above par in gold. The note-holder, interest in gold, with his bond above par in gold. The note-holder, the farmer, the artisan, the laborer, whose labor and production is measured in greenbacks, still receives your depreciated notes worth 10 per cent. less than gold you promised him "at the earliest day practicable." The one has a promise performed and the other a promise postponed.

Thus we stood when the panic of '73 came upon us; with more paper money afloat than ever circulated before in any country of the paper money alloat than ever circulated before in any country of the world. Even then, had we stood firmly, the hoarding tendency of the panic would have advanced our notes toward the gold standard, and in fact did so during the months of September and October, until the premium on gold had fallen to 8 per cent. But sir, at this critical moment, the Secretary of the Treasury, acting no doubt in good faith, but I think without authority of law, issued twenty-six millions more United States notes—part of the notes retired and canceled under previous acts. And now, notwithstanding all the talk about contraction of the currency, we have not withdrawn one-half of this illegal issue. On the 1st of September, 1873, we had three hundred and fifty-six million notes outstanding. Three months afterward we had three hundred and eighty-two million; and now we have three hundred and seventy-one million.

THE ACT OF 1875 A PLEDGE OF PUBLIC FAITH.

Sir, it was under the light of these events, after the fullest discussion ever given in Congress of any question—after debate before the people during the recess of Congress and full deliberation last winter people during the recess of Congress and full deliberation last winter—this act was passed. There was and is now great difference of opinion as to the details, but the vital promise made to the note-holder to make his note as good as gold in January, 1879, was concurred in by a large majority of both Houses, and by many who opposed the bill as too slow in its operations. This act of honor and public faith was applanded by the civilized world and concurred in by our constituents the doubts only being as to the machinery to carry it into effect. ents, the doubts only being as to the machinery to carry it into effect. The time was fixed by those who most feared resumption, and no one proposed a longer time. My honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. Morrow] truly said (in the recent campaign in Ohio) that he participated in framing it; and he and those who agreed with him fixed the time so remote as to excite the unfounded charge that the bill was a sham, a mere contrivance to bridge an election.

And now, sir, to recapitulate this branch of the question, it is shown that the holder of these notes has a promise of the United States made in February, 1862, to pay him $1 in gold coin; that the legal purport of this promise has been declared by the Supreme Court; that we have taken away from this note one of the legal attributes given it which would long since have secured its payment in coin— that when the note was authorized and issued it was understood as redeemable in coin when the war was over; that our promise to pay it was renewed in 1869—"at as early a day as practicable;" that by reason of our failure to provide for its payment it is still depreciated below par more than one-tenth of its nominal value; that we renewed this promise and made it definite as to time by act of 1875; that it is a debt due from the United States, and in law and honor due now in coin. Yet it is proposed to recall our promise to redeem this note in coin three years hence. I say, sir, this would be national dishonor. It would destroy the confidence with which the public creditor rests upon the promises contained in your bonds. It would greatly tend to arrest the process by which the interest on your bonds is reduced. It would accustom our people to the substitution of a temporary wave of popular opinion for its written contract or promise. It would weaken in the public mind that keen sense of honor and pride which has always distinguished the English-speaking nations in dealing with public obligations.

An old writer thus describes "public credit:"

An old writer thus describes "public credit:"

Credit is a consequence, not a cause; the effect of a substance, not a substance; it is the sunshine, not the sun; the quickening something, call it what you will, that gives life to trade, gives being to the branches and moisture to the root; it is the oil of the wheel, the marrow in the bones, the blood in the veins, and the spirits in the heart of all the negoce, trade, cash, and commerce in the world.

It is produced, and grows insensibly from fair and upright dealing, punctual compliance, honorable performance of contracts and covenants; in short, it is the off-spring of universal probity.

It is apparent even by its nature; it is no way dependent upon persons, parliament, or any particular men or set of men as such in the world, but upon their conduct and just behavior. Credit never was chained to men's names, but to their actions; not to families, clans, or collections of men; no, not to nations. It is the honor, the justice, the fair-dealing, and the equal conduct of men, bodies of men, nations, and people, that raise the thing called credit among them. Wheresoever this is found credit will live and thrive, grow and increase; where this is wanting, let all the power and wit of man join together, they can neither give her being nor preserve her life.

Arts have been tried on various occasions in the world to raise credit; art has been found able with more ease to destroy credit than to raise it. The force of art, assisted by the punctual, fair, and just-dealing abovesaid, may have done much to form a credit upon the face of things, but we find still the honor would have done it without the art, but never the art without the honor. Nor will money itself, which, Solomon says, answers all things, purchase this thing called credit or restore it when lost.

Our-credit in this case is a public thing. It is rightly called by some of our writers national credit. The word denominates its original. It is produced by the nation's probity, the honor and exact performing national engagements.

WHY PUBLIC POLICY FORBIDS ITS REPEAL.

And, sir, passing from considerations of public honor, there are many reasons of public policy which forbid the repeal of the act of 1875. That act was generally regarded as the settlement of a financial policy by which at least the party in power is bound, and upon the faith of which business men have conducted their affairs and made their contracts. Debts have been contracted and paid with the expectation that at the time fixed the gold standard would measure all obligations, and a repeal of the act would now re-open all the wild and dangerous speculation schemes that feed and fatten upon depreciated paper money. The influence that secures this repeal will not stop here. If we can recall our promise to pay our notes outstanding why should we not issue more? If we can disregard our promise to why should we not issue more? If we can disregard our promise to pay them, why shall we regard our promise not to issue more than $400,000,000 as stipulated for by the act of 1864? If we can re-open the $400,000,000 as stipulated for by the act of 1864? If we can re-open the question of the payment of our notes, why may we not re-open the question as to the payment of our bonds? Is the act of 1869 any more sacred than the act of 1875? And if we can re-open these questions, why not re-open the laws requiring the payment of either interest or principal of the public debt? They rest upon acts of Congress which we have the power to repeal. If the public honor cannot protect our promise to the note-holder, how shall it protect our promise to the bondholder? Already do we see advocated in high places, by numerous and formidable organizations, all forms of repudiation, which, if adonted, would reduce our nation to the credit of a robber chief if adopted, would reduce our nation to the credit of a robber chiefworse than the credit of an Algerine pirate, who at least would not plunder his own countrymen. And if the public creditor had no safety, what chance would the national banks—creations of our own safety, what chance would the national banks—creations of our own and subject to our will—have in Congress? It has already been proposed to confiscate their bonds, premium and all, as a mode of paying their notes with greenbacks. What expedient so easy if we would make money cheap and abundant? Or, if so extreme a measure could be arrested, what is to prevent the permanent dethronement of gold as a measure of value, and the substitution of an interconvertible currency bond bearing 3.65 per cent. interest as a standard of value; and when it becomes too expensive to print the notes to pay the interest, reduce the rate. Why not? Why pay 3.65 per cent. when it is easier to print 3? It is but an act of Congress. And when the process of repudiation goes so far that your notes will not buy bread, why then declare against all interest, and then, after passing through the valley of humiliation return again to barter, and honor, and gold again.

Sir, if you once commence this downward course of repudiation there is but one ending. You may, like Mirabeau and the Girondists, seek to stem the torrent, but you will be swept away by the spirit you have evoked and the instruments you have created. You comyou have evoked and the instruments you have created. You complain now of a want of confidence which makes men hoard their money. Will you, then, destroy all confidence? No, sir, no; the way to restore confidence is to inspire it by fulfilling your obligations. You cannot make men lend you; you cannot make men sell you anything—either bread, or meat, or wool, or iron, or anything that is or that can be created—except for that which they choose to take. You may depreciate the money which you offer, but it will only take more of it to buy what you want. It is true that the creditor may, by your laws be conveiled to take your money however much you by your laws, be compelled to take your money however much you depreciate it, but he cannot buy back that which he sold, or its equivalent in other necessaries of life, and thus he is cheated of part of what he sold. During the war, while money was depreciating, many a simple man gleefully counted his gains as he sold his goods or crops at advancing prices, but he found out his mistake when with his swollen pile he tried to replace his stock in trade or laid in his supplies. Sir, this policy exhausts itself in cheating the man who buys or sells or loans on credit, who produces something to sell on credit; whether that something be food or clothing; whether it be a necessity or a luxury of life. Productive labor, honest toil, whether of the farmer or the artisan, is deeply interested in credit. It is credit that gives life and competition to trade; and credit is destroyed by every scheme that impairs, delays, or even clouds an obligation.

Again, sir, an irredeemable and fluctuating currency always raises the rate of interest on money, while a stable currency or an improving currency always reduces the rate of interest. This is easily shown by statistics, but the reason is so obvious that proof is not reached. If a man lends his means he may be a second of the reason is so obvious that proof is not needed. If a man lends his money he wants it back again with its increase; but if the money, when it is to be paid back, is like to be worth less than when he thinks of loaning it, he will not loan it except at such rates as will cover the risk of depreciation. He will prefer to buy land or something of stable value. If money is at the gold standard or is advancing toward that standard, he will loan it readily at a moderate interest, for he knows he will receive back money of at least equal value to that he loaned.

Again, sir, with a depreciated currency great domestic productions are cut off from the foreign market; for it is impossible that with such a currency we can compete on equal terms with rival nations, whose industry rests upon a specie standard. As we approach such a standard, we are now able as to a few articles to compete with foreign industry; but it is only as to articles in the manufacture of which we have peculiar advantages. Let us rest our industries on that standard, and soon we could compete in the markets of the world in all the articles produced from iron, wood, leather, and cotton, the raw basis of which are our natural productions. And it must be remembered that all the countries with which we compete are specie-paying countries. A country that does not rest her industry upon specie is necessarily excluded from the great manufacturing industrial productions. indus ries of modern civilization, and is self-condemned to produce only the raw basis for advanced industry. Cheap food, climate, soil, or natural advantages, such as cheap land, vast plains for pasture, or rich mines, may give to a country wealth and prosperity in spite of the evils of depreciated paper money; but when we come in competi-tion with the world in the advanced grades of production which give employment to the skilled mechanic, we must rest such industry upon the gold basis, or we enter the lists like a knight with his armor un-

Again, sir, a depreciated and fluctuating currency is a premium and bounty to the broker and money-changer. Under his manipulation our paper standard of value goes up and down, and he gambles and speculates, with all the advantages in his favor. Good people look on and think that it is gold that is going up and down; that their money is a dollar still, and trade and traffic in that belief. But the shrewd operator calculates daily the depreciation of our note, the shortening of the yard-stick, the shrinkage of the acre, the lessening of the ton, and thus it is that he daily adds to his gains from the indifference or delusion of our people.

Sir, it is an old story, often repeated in our day, and most eloquently epitomized by Daniel Webster in the often-quoted passage of his speech in which he said:

speech in which he said:

A disordered currency is one of the greatest of political evils. It undermines the virtues necessary for the support of the social system and encourages propensities destructive of its happiness. It wars against industry, frugality, and economy; and it fosters the evil spirit of extravagance and speculation. Of all contrivances for cheating the laboring classes of mankind none has been more effectual than that which deluded them with paper money. Ordinary tyranny, oppression, excessive taxation, these bear lightly on the happiness of the mass of the community, compared with the fraudulent currencies and the robberies committed by depreciated paper. Our own history has recore of for our instruction enough, and more than enough, of the demoralizing tendency, the injustice, and the intolerable oppression of the virtuous and well-disposed of a degraded paper currency authorized by law or in any way countenanced by Government.

Sir, we must meet this question of specie payments, not only because the public honor is pledged to do so, but also for the lesser reason that it is our interest to do so. The only questions we should permit ourselves to discuss are the means and measures of doing so.

And now, sir, let us examine the reasons that have been given for the rejeal of the resumption act by those who, though favoring resumption, yet think the act should be repealed for one or other of the following reasons:

First. That it is not advisable to fix a day for resumption.

Second. Or at least until the balance of trade is in our favor. Third. That it produces a contraction of the currency. Fourth. That it injuriously adds to the burden of existing debts.

WHY FIX A DAY FOR RESUMPTION.

Let us glance at these objections.

First. As to fixing a day for resumption.

If it was possible to agree upon measures that would secure resumption without fixing a time, I agree it would not be indispensable, though not unadvisable, to fix a time; but such agreement is utterly impossinot unadvisable, to fix a time; but such agreement is utterly impossible. Of the multitude of schemes that have been presented to me by intelligent men trying to solve this problem, many could have been selected that in my opinion would be practicable; but of all of them not one ever has or is likely to secure the assent of a majority of a body so numerous as Congress. One difficulty we have encountered is that the democratic party, though in the minority, has never presented in any form through any leading member a plan for resumption, but with widely differing opinions have joined in opposing any and every measure from the other side. I understand from the papers that our democratic friends through a canens, and through a canens. and every measure from the other side. I understand from the papers that our democratic friends through a caucus, and through a caucus committee of which my colleague is chairman, have been laboring to agree upon a plan for specie payments. After his frequent speeches to us about a caucus measure—a great question being submitted to a caucus—about secret conclaves, about shams and deceptions and such like polite and friendly comments upon the work of the republican party, I might greet my colleague with such happy phrases about his cancus; that I will not but on the contrary I commend his labors. party, I might greet my colleague with such happy phrases about his cancus; but I will not, but on the contrary I commend his labors, and sincerely hope that he and his political friends may agree upon some plan to reach a specie standard, and not one to avoid it, to prevent it, to defer it. Under color of intending to prepare for it, I hope they will not make their measure the pretext for repealing the law as it stands, which fixes a day for resumption and will secure the end we both aim at.

I frankly state for the republican party that, while we could agree and sufficient powers upon the Secretary of the Treasury contained in this law, we could agree in prescribing the precise mode in which the process should be executed. Nor, in my opinion, was it at all essential that we should. Much must be left to the discretion of the officer charged with the execution of such a law. The powers conferred, as I shall show hereafter, are ample; and the discretion given will be exercised under the eye of Congress.

And, sir, there is strong force in the fact that in every example we And, sir, there is strong force in the fact that in every example we have of the successful resumption of specie payments in this and other countries a fixed day has been named by legislative authority, and the details and power of execution have been left to executive authority. Thus in Great Britain the act of Parliament of July 2, 1819, fixed the time for full resumption at the 1st day of May, 1823, and for a graduated resumption in gold at intermediate dates; and for fractional sums under forty shillings to be paid in silver coin; and the governor and directors of the Bank of England were charged with its execution, and authorized at their discretion to resume payment in full on the 1st day of May, 1822. France is now successfully passing through the same process of resumption, the time being fixed (two years ago) for January 1, 1878, and now practically attained. In our own country many of the States have presented similar laws in case of suspended bank payments, and in some cases the suspended banks have, by associated action, fixed a time for general resumption, and each bank adopted its own expedient for it. Sir, the light of experience is the lamp of wisdom. I can recall no case of successful resumption where a fixed future time has not been presented beforesumption where a fixed future time has not been presented beforehand, either by law or agreement; while the historical examples of repudiation of currency have come by the drifting process, by a gradual decline of value, by increased issues, and a refusal to provide measures of redemption, until the whole mass disappeared, dishonored and repudiated.

This concurrence in the mode of resumption by so many governments was the strongest possible instruction to Congress when fixing a plan of resumption for the United States, and should satisfy reasonable men of its wisdom.

Besides, it would seem to be but fair that every one should have plain notice of so important a fact. If the measures only were presented and no time fixed it would be a matter of speculation, and the discretionary powers of the Secretary of the Treasury could be exercised with a view to hasten or postpone the time to the injury of individuals.

As to the date selected, I can only repeat it was placed as remote as any one suggested; far more so than is necessary to secure the object, and so that the fluctuations of value will scarcely exceed in four years what they have frequently been in a single year. An ample time to arrange all the relations of debtor and creditor, and to enable Congress to provide any additional measure in aid of resumptions of the state tion, or if events make it expedient to postpone the time.

BALANCE OF TRADE.

Again, it has been objected that we connot resume until the balance of trade is in our favor. This phrase, "balance of trade," has been a favorite one with visionaries and theorists, sufficiently indefinite to favorite one with visionaries and theorists, sufficiently indefinite to confuse and to mislead. As generally understood, the dogma is "that a nation that imports more than it exports is growing poorer;" or, conversely, "that a nation that exports more than it imports is prosperous." Now, sir, either proposition has been proven false in many cases, and may be true in some. It does not follow that an excess of imports creates distress, or a deficiency of exports is an evidence of poverty. Even the excess of imports upon which interest may be paid may be of wealth-producing productions; or a deficiency of exports may be caused by an increased domestic manufacture of raw products by home industry. But the best way to test the fallacy of products by home industry. But the best way to test the fallacy of this dogma is by reference to examples. Great Britain is known to be a prosperous nation of accumulating and accumulated wealth, and yet her imports have exceeded her exports every year for twenty years. The general average of her imports in excess of exports is £50,000,000 or $250,000,000 a year. I have here the detailed statement of her imports and exports for 1872 and 1873:

1872.	ImportsExports	£354, 693, 624 314, 588, 834
	Excess of imports over exports	40, 104, 790	or $200, 000, 000
1873.	Imports	371, 287, 372 311, 004, 765

Excess of imports over exports ...... 60, 282, 607 or $300, 000, 000 Now, according to the dogma of the "balance of trade," Great Britain is going into a rapid decay; while she knows this large excess of imports is an addition to her national wealth.

But take our own country and compare years of conceded prosperity with years of hard times.

	1867.	1868.
Imports	$391, 121, 801 334, 350, 653	$351, 214, 010 352, 788, 202
Balance of trade against us	56, 771, 148

Yet we were then prosperous, as we have so often been told, with plenty of paper money. Take the two last years, when we are told so often that distress, misery, and poverty prevailed:

	1874.	1875.
Exports at gold value, including gold	$652, 913, 445 595, 861, 248	$605, 574, 853 553, 906, 153
Balance of trade in our favor	57, 052, 197	51, 668, 700

And the balance of trade in our favor is more striking during the seven months of the present fiscal year, from the 1st of July, 1875, to the 1st of February, 1876.

The total exports, reduced to gold values, were ...... $334, 853, 996 Tre total imports were.....

Leaving a balance in our favor in coin for seven months of .....

53, 124, 261

All these amounts are reduced to a coin basis, and include both the importation and exportation of coin.

According to the dogma of the balance of trade, now is the golden moment to resume, when the balance is in our favor nearly one hundred millions a year. Yet many people cry out, "Wait for the balance of trade; don't force resumption." Well, the time has come, and yet they are not ready. This dogma has been the cause of infinite confusion, but is now abandoned. McCullough, in his Dictionary of Commerce, thus refers to it:

of Commerce, thus refers to it:

In commerce the term "balance of trade" is commonly used to express the difference between the value of the exports from and imports into a country. The balance used to be said to be favorable when the value of the exports exceeded that of the imports, and unfavorable when the value of the imports exceeded that of the exports. And in this country this was long believed to be the case, and down to a late period we were annually congratulated by our finance ministers on the excess of the exports over the imports.

The attainment of a favorable balance was formerly regarded as an object of the greatest importance.

The truth is, however, that the theory of the balance of trade was not erroneous merely from the false notions which its advocates entertained with respect to money, but proceeded on radically mistaken views as to the nature of commerce.

The argument about the balance of payments is one of those that contradict and confute themselves.

Not only, therefore, is the theory with respect to the balance of trade erroneous, but the very reverse of that theory is true.

It is difficult to estimate the mischief which the absurd notions relative to the balance of trade have occasioned in almost every commercial country; here they have been particularly injurious.

This author fortifies his position with ample details, but it is suf-

This author fortifies his position with ample details, but it is sufficient to say that if the dogma is false we should not regard it, and, if it is true, now is the golden moment for resumption, for the balance of trade is in our favor. In my view it is utterly immaterial to the question before us.

CONTRACTION.

The third objection is that the law produces a great contraction of the currency

Now, sir, it ought to be confessed, for it is true, that any plan for specie resumption will, when it is about to take effect, produce some contraction of the paper currency. The drifting process if it succeeds must cause it as well. To wait for resumption until resumption will produce no temporary contraction is to wait until the rivers cease to flow or the mountains are level with the plains. Every time resumption has taken place in the historical cases I have referred to, contraction has preceded it. Remedies for bodily or political ailments are apt to be unpleasant. All we can say is that public honor and public policy demand the remedy for the dishonor and the evil of a depreciated currency; that the time is ripe for the cure and the means we have prescribed are suitable to the end.

And, sir, the degree of contraction and the effects of it are greatly exaggerated. The only contraction of the currency provided for by exaggerated. The only contraction of the currency provided for by the act is in the substitution of one form of currency for another. Thus, in place of the fractional currency is issued silver currency; and where national-bank notes are issued there is retired 80 per cent. of the amount in United States notes. Thus far no fractional curof the amount in United States notes. Thus far no fractional currency has been retired; but, as I will show hereafter, we can now and will, if the law stands, issue as much silver currency as any one may wish in exchange for either fractional currency or United States notes; and, as to bank-notes, the amount issued since the act took effect is $13,820,760, and the amount of United States notes retired is $11,056,608, leaving of United States notes still outstanding $370,943,-392, or $14,900,000 more than was outstanding when the act of March, 1869, was passed, and the same amount more than was outstanding on the 14th day of Sentamber 1873 when the pagic came. Thus on the 14th day of September, 1873, when the panic came. Thus it appears that under the law the amount of bank-notes issued is $2,800,000 more than the United States notes retired, and the contraction of the currency prescribed by this law is a myth.

But there has been a contraction of the currency since the panic, and before and after the passage of the act of 1875, which will go on whenever in any way a specie standard approaches, and that is by the voluntary retirement by national banks of a portion of their cir-culating notes. This contraction is not provided for by the resumption act, but is authorized by the national banking acts, and is the healthy ebb and flow of currency which it was the object of the law to secure. The national banks retired $24,962,327 of their notes by depositing that amount of United States notes in the Treasury of the United States to be used exclusively in redeeming the bank-notes when presented. The only motive for this deposit was that in the opinion of those banks the circulating notes could not be profitably used, or they were not strong enough to maintain at the specie basis the whole of their notes. This process will and ought to go on until each bank is certain it can maintain resumption at the time stated. Nor is this contraction in the slightest degree injurious to the bank or to the ability of the bank to loan money to its customers. The banks will not withdraw their notes unless it is their interest to do so. When they do surrender or redeem their notes they at once receive a larger amount of their bonds held as security for their notes, and worth about 30 per cent. more than the notes redeemed. Thus, the whole of their notes. This process will and ought to go on until and worth about 30 per cent. more than the notes redeemed. Thus, when a bank surrenders $9,000 of its circulating notes it lifts from the lien of the note-holder $10,000 of United States bonds worth today about $12,000. If the bank sells the bonds it has $12,000 of currency to loan, and has strengthened itself by paying $9,000 of its notes. This process, instead of being a cause of alarm, should be encouraged and hastened; and this is practically the only contraction effected by this bill, a contraction which is in the very line clamored for by those who oppose national banks; but a voluntary contraction, made by the silent operation of the interest of the bank, while at the same time it advances the residue of notes to par in gold.

RESUMPTION THROUGH NATIONAL BANKS.

Sir, in my judgment, the real solution of specie resumption will thus come through the voluntary act of national banks, each acting for itself, under the general direction of the law, precisely as the Bank of England, the Bank of France, and the New York banks brought about and maintained resumption. I have never regarded with solicitude the amount of United States notes outstanding, for, as I will show, they can be easily maintained at par in gold; but the agency of the banks in securing resumption and the effect of resumption upon their customers were matters of solicitude. This I no longer doubt or fear. The whole problem consists in a partial and limited transfer of capital now invested by national banks in United States bonds to incapital now invested by national banks in United States bonds to individuals. The high price of these bonds and the idle capital that seeks investment in them will enable each bank to strengthen itself by a sale of bonds without in the least impairing its ability to discount or loan, and, in fact, to increase its power to do so, and the bonds will be absorbed by the increasing demand for such securities. Strong banks in cities do not need the currency, for their currency is certified checks. Their currency is largely held by them, or, if in circulation, it can be retired and canceled without impairing in the least their ability to leav or discount. The hark currency being the least their ability to loan or discount. The bank currency being thus diminished, as the time for resumption approaches, the United States notes, supported by a gold reserve and the power of the Secretary to sell bonds, will easily be maintained at the gold standard, and the problem is solved.

And, sir, this partial contraction of bank currency will unlock and dissipate a greater contraction which has gone on since the panic, and will go on until the public mind rests assured that the day of resumption is not only promised but rendered certain by the course of events. An increase of currency will follow resumption. Great masses of notes now lie idle in bank-vaults and in the Treasury, and are hoarded in homesteads all over the land. There is deposited in the Treasury, without interest and belonging to banks, $31,005,000, represented by without interest and belonging to banks, $31,005,000, represented by currency certificates. There are now in the vaults of the national banks $73,626,100 United States notes and fractional currency, $17,166,190 bank-notes, in all $90,792,290, and in the savings-banks, State banks, and other banks that have made returns to the Comptroller of the Currency the sum of $45,431,409, in all making $170,228,699, and this is far more than the reserve required by law. The practice of hoarding currency has greatly increased from the day of the panic, and it may be safely said that there is among the people and in savings-banks and trust companies not less than $200,000,000 of currency idle. Nothing but the best of security will tenut it from its hiding-places; but, that the best of security will tempt it from its hiding-places; but, that security offered, it can be had for a less rate of interest than ever be-fore. Capital met its periodical shock in September, 1873, and great masses of it, some say one thousand millions, vanished as a dream, and are now represented by worthless bonds, bills, notes, and certificates of stock, worth but little more than the paper on which they are printed. This panic came upon us when the paper god was lord of the ascendant, when corner lots, at fictitious prices, were the par of exchange; when unproductive railroads were the El Dorados of visionaries, and wild schemes of improvement, both in this city and in all the cities of the Union, increased municipal debts to an unexam-pled degree. This reckless inflation of credits collapsed long before this law was passed. Money, the agent of capital, and, when idle, capital itself, was hoarded, and still remains inactive, or is loaned on call or unquestioned security. This is the contraction of which so many complain. It is not caused by the resumption act, but by a want of confidence in investments that offer. Confidence cannot be restored by a repeal or by issuing more paper money. But the occasion does offer you an opportunity of withdrawing a portion of this idle money, and thus reaching a specie standard. The banks can freely surrender a portion of their circulation, and thus be strong for resumption; while frightened and timid capital will gladly float into United States bonds when sold by the banks. Nothing is wanted but confidence, faith, and time to secure the closing triumph of our war policy by the redemption of the only promise we then made that has not been honestly redeemed.

EFFECT UPON EXISTING DEBTS.

The remaining objection to the law is that it will add to the burden of existing debts. This objection is also inseparable from any plan of of existing debts. This objection is also inseparable from any plan or resumption. Postponement or repeal will not help the matter. The time for redemption must come. Current indebtedness was never less than now. Liquidation has gone on rapidly since the panic, and in many cases by open bankruptcy. Debts contracted since the passage of the act have been made in view of resumption in 1879. Many of the old debts run for a long period of years, and when issued were made upon the presumption of specie payments before they matured. Other large masses of debts stipulate for the payment of both principal and interest in coin. Nearly all the best investment securities are now at or near par in gold and are bought and sold at gold values. Current debts in trade mature and are paid long before the time for resumption, and if renewed, the debtor and creditor adjust the mode of payment. All new transactions are based upon the knowledge that specie payments will come at the time stated, and for that reason lower rates of interest are stipulated for. Let it once be fixed in the lower rates of interest are stipulated for. Let it once be fixed in the public mind that on the 1st of January, 1879, paper money will be advanced to the specie standard, and debtors will readily borrow money payable in that standard at lower rates of interest. Capital will no longer be invested in gold bonds from the fear that if loaned to individuals it will be paid back in depreciated paper, but will eagerly be invested at low rates of interest on mortgage or other security if to be paid in improved and improving currency. Industries now languid or suspended will hopefully revive now that stocks are reduced and productions will have a fixed commercial value not are reduced, and productions will have a fixed commercial value, not only in home markets but the markets of the world. Merchants now fear the shrinkage of prices, but their stocks will be renewed at a corresponding reduction of prices until all are measured by the gold standard, when they need have no fear of change of prices except those arising from demand and supply. Debtors are also generally creditors, and the loss and gain in values will balance each other, and the time is ample in which all losses can be adjusted. Never could our condition be better to resume the specie standard than now, unless we intend to perpetuate the use of depreciated paper money and totally disregard the pledge of the public faith to redeem United States notes in coin.

THE DRIFTING PROCESS.

There are two objections made to the law which I ought not to pass traction, and the amount of bank-notes at $300,000,000, and forbade its enlargement. It was said we would grow into resumption. This was the plausible dogma with which I was met when I sought the funding of notes into bonds. The result I have already stated. In 1870 the sectional inequality of the distribution of bank currency, inflamed into a passion by the sectional appeals of Horatio Seymour when a candidate for President in 1868, forced the enlargement of the limit of bank notes to $354,000,000; and the vain hope of stopping a panic by paper promises forced the enlargement of the limit of United States notes to $382,000,000. So will it always be with this drifting States notes to $382,000,000. So will it always be with this driving process. When we reach a specie standard it is safe enough. If national banks then issue more money, upon sufficient security to pay in coin, they do it at their peril, and the people cannot lose nor their standard of value fluctuate. But even if it was possible to fix the present volume of currency as an arbitrary limit, it would only prolong indefinitely the evils of a depreciated currency. No one believes that we could maintain in circulation near $800,000,000 of paper money all the time at par in gold. It must have the quality of fleximoney all the time at par in gold. It must have the quality of flexibility in amount to meet the currents of trade and business—at times withdrawn, and when needed reissued, but always of the value of and these qualities can only be secured by prompt redemption when it is not needed, and its reissue through loans and discounts by banks when the crops are to be moved or trade becomes active.

WHY NO APPARENT RESULTS.

And as to the objection that the law has not already produced more immediate results, I admit that this is an objection to the law, but it was unavoidable under the circumstances. The time for resumption should have been fixed much earlier, so that its effect would have been more rapid. If by the law the banks had been compelled to prepare for resumption sooner, the appreciation of our notes would have been more marked; and so if a portion of the notes could be funded, or either gold or notes could be held in reserve by the sale of bonds. Who does not wish that our notes were now worth ninety-five instead of eighty-nine cents on the dollar? And yet to produce that result we must have hastened either the day for resumption or strengthened the measures for resumption. But what is the remedy for this slow process? Is it to repeal the law, not a single provision of which by its terms has been put in full operation? Is it to revoke our promise and all efforts to fulfill it? Obviously not, but to stand by our engagement and perform it sooner if circumstances will allow.

CAN WE REDEEM ON THE 1ST DAY OF JANUARY, 1879?

And now, sir, I come to the second proposition stated: Can we resume specie payments on the 1st day of January, 1879?

On this proposition we are to consider the question as it affects the national banks, the fractional currency, and the United States notes.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

As to the national banks, I have already stated how redemption with them becomes an easy and natural process to be performed without injury to them, or to their customers, or to their usefulness, by a transfer or sale of United States bonds especially set aside for that purpose, and only to the extent that each bank may deem essential to its safety. The national banks are now exceptionally strong.

Their circulating notes amount to $346,479,756. Of these notes they have in their vaults the sum of $17,166,190. They have with the They have with the Treasurer of the United States $356,680,150 in United States bonds worth $427,947,224 in currency or $374,582,200 in coin. They also hold United States bonds to secure United States deposits $13,981,500, and other United States bonds held in their vaults to the amount of other United States bonds held in their vaults to the amount of $16,909,550. They have a surplus over and above the capital fully paid up, the sum of $192,300,000. With the great body of them the redemption of the whole or a large part of their circulation is a matter of indifference. To the extent of a certain per cent. of their deposits and 5 per cent. of their circulation they must maintain a reserve of United States notes, and to that extent will aid the United States in maintaining resumption. The amount of this reserve now required is $80,135,200, but the amount in hand is $118,800,987. As United States notes are equivalent to coin with them they will seek required is $50,135,200, but the amount in hand is $118,800,957. As United States notes are equivalent to coin with them, they will seek to hold as much as they can, as other banks in England hold the notes of the Bank of England. Is it not, then, apparent that the national banks are able to resume, are prepared to resume, and that resumption by them need not be delayed a single year; and that so far as their notes are concerned it is a shame and scandal that they are only worth eighty-nine cents on the dollar—and all because the United States will not advance its notes to par in gold? States will not advance its notes to par in gold ?

FRACTIONAL CURRENCY.

Now, sir, as to the fractional currency. This was issued to take the place of the subsidiary silver coins of the country during the war. The amount outstanding, as shown by the books of the Treasury, is $45,120,132; but of this many millions have been lost and destroyed, and this is shown by the large amount of the old issues never presented although long superseded. It is probable that not exceeding $40,000,000 will be presented for redemption. Now, sir, as to this currency we are able to-day to issue silver coin of legal weight and fineness in exchange dollar for dollar for fractional currency, not only without loss but with an actual profit. One ounce of silver bullion, or four hundred and eighty grains of standard fineness, is worth in the market $1.05 in coin. One dollar of our silver coin contains three hundred and eighty four grains of standard silver; so that one dollar of silver coin will cost the United States eighty-four and one-quarter cents besides the cost of coining. To the extent that our people will take silver coin in exchange for fractional currency, the problem is already solved. It is said this coin will be hoarded. So much the better. We can furnish from our own mines all that is needed to the extent of fifteen millions on hand and two millions a month more, that being the extent of our coinage facilities. It is said it will be exported. No such good luck will befall us, for silver bullion is cheaper and better for export. If we issue it, we will either redeem a note or save paying out a note, and either way we make a profit. If fifty millions silver coin is held by our people it is to that extent a reserve for specie payments where it is most useful among the people. I wish they would take one hundred millions, and no doubt enough will be taken to redeem all the fractional currency that our people will not prefer to hold.

UNITED STATES NOTES.

And now the only remaining question is, Can we redeem or maintain at par by the 1st day of January, 1879, the United States notes? The amount of them outstanding to-day is $370,943,392 less those lost and destroyed. Now, many who fear resumption suppose the whole mass of United States notes will then be presented for the gold; and they have counted up the number of tons of gold that will be required to do it. They figure up the interest at 5 per cent. on the whole sum, and state that as an addition to our annual interest account. It is not necessary to reply to such exaggerations; nor is it possible to state with precision what amount of United States notes would circulate at par in coin. They could then be made receivable for customs dues without a violation of the public faith. They will always be the reserve of national banks. They could then be made receivable for bonds of the United States. They could be supported by the power to sell bonds to redeem them. They would, as a matter of course, be supported by the whole gold reserve in the Treasury. They would take the place of certificates of deposit and be used in clearing-house exchanges.

Now, sir, with all these advantages, with the growing wealth and credit of our country, I do not believe the present volume of United States notes need be largely if any reduced to keep them at par in coin. We have now a gold balance in the Treasury of $37,120,772.73, and a currency balance of $9,529,404 over and above our currency and coin certificates. It is true this balance is subject to overdue and accraing demands fully stated in a recent letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, but a certain amount of these demands always remain uncalled for, and when presented are met by accruing revenue. Suppose (what I regard as an extreme case) that we add to this reserve $100,000,000, fifty million in coin certificates and fifty million in coin, does any body doubt but it will be ample to redeem any note that is presented? Confidence being once established in their redemption, and who will want the gold for them? They can be and no doubt will be re-issued without or with the legal-tender clause, as the law may hereafter provide, and with their credit secured, established at par in coin, they will not only circulate in Texas and on the Pacific slope as well as in other parts of the United States, but, like the Bank of England note, in all countries that have commercial relations with us.

BURDEN OF RESUMPTION.

Let us pursue the argument taking the full burden of resumption as the interest of one hundred millions per annum. The rate of interest now in currency may be stated at 4 per cent. or 41 per cent. in gold. Thus four to four and one-half millions a year three years hence is the extreme burden of specie payments. Sir, the sinking fund in three years amounts to more than the one hundred millions you are to keep in reserve. The saving already made thus far by funding the debt into 5 per cent. bonds is five millions a year. The saving that you will make by the funding into 4½ per cent. will be seven and one-half millions in gold, or nearly twice as much as is needed. The saving of four millions on the appropriation bills sent to us will cover the cost. A duty of five cents on the gallon of needed. The saving of four millions on the appropriation bills sent to us will cover the cost. A duty of five cents on the gallon of whisky will do it. One-half of the smallest duty ever levied on tea and coffee will do it. One-half of the taxes now levied on national banks by the United States will do it. The increased value of our banks by the United States will do it. The increased value of our tax on whisky and tobacco being paid in coin will twice do it. Are we able to do it? Are we able to keep our promises when made specific as to time, place, and manner? I do not care to discuss this question further. Sir, the United States has been blessed by divine Providence with all the gifts which He has ever showered upon the human race. We have a broad and fruitful land, with almost every variety of climate and production. We have forty millions of free people, industrious, intelligent, brave as becomes men, shrewd and sagacious in trade and production, and loving honor and a good name. sagacious in trade and production, and loving honor and a good name. To say that we cannot redeem our promises is to dishonor the blessings of God; it is to eat of the forbidden fruit when all the productions of nature and art are within our reach; it is to dishonor our name and credit when the world is ready to lend us at a less rate of interest than any nation of the world except Great Britain has ever borrowed for; it is a party retreat; it is a national retreat; it is a retreat of cowardice from a task we promised to perform, that we are able to perform, and which every noble motive that actuates mankind impels us to perform.

But, it is said, where is the gold to come from to enable us to resume. Not only is the gold of the world open to our competition, but we are the largest gold and silver producing country of the world. The product of our mines is about one hundred millions a year, and a single year's product would more than enable us to resume. Our facilities for accumulating gold are greater than any other nation. "But the gold is exported." So it is, because we will not use it as the other nations do. Give it occupation here and it will remain here, and the products of our farms and workshops will be exported instead. said we can make a standard of something else that is not exportable. So we can by cutting ourselves off from the civilization of the human sir, I have been struck by the absolute poverty of invention of those who in our day seek to dispense with the gold standard. Every plan proposed, every idea suggested is but the repetition of plans and ideas proposed in the American colonies, in Great Britain, in China, and by George Law. Their schemes have been tried and exploded over and over again for four thousand years, and yet gold and silver now measure ever article of property and will measure the silver now measure ever article of property and will measure the daily fluctuations of the contrivances they invent.

POWERS CONFERRED BY ACT OF 1875.

And now, sir, let us turn from the main question and briefly examine the third question: Are the agencies and measures prescribed by the act of 1875 sufficient for the purpose?

I need not remind this Senate and Senators around me how reluctantly I came to the support of this bill, because it does not contain provisions that for years I have struggled to secure. Still, sir, I feel bound to say that it contains ample agencies and powers to carry it into a full execution without the addition of a single provision by Congress. The first section of the bill is limited to the redemption of fractional currency. This, as I have shown, can now be fully executed, and the only criticism is that it has not been sooner executed. Not only can the notes be redeemed in silver without loss, but the actual cost of coining the silver, strange as it may seem, is less than the printing of the fractional currency.

COST OF SILVER COIN AND FRACTIONAL CURRENCY.

The cost of coining subsidiary silver coinage is shown by the Director of the Mint to be from 1½ to 2 per cent., and with the mints running to their full capacity it is much less.

The actual profits of seignorage will not only pay this cost, but more than the interest on the bonds we may sell to procure the bullion.

On the other hand, the cost of the fractional currency is 31 per cent. of the amount issued; or, to be exact, the expense of preparing and redeeming the fractional currency for the year 1875 was $1,410,746.95. The amount issued was $40,365,145. And what is worse, the average life of these notes is less than one year, so that this expense is an annual one almost equal to the interest on the whole sum. Thus the The silver coin pays a debt when issued, while the fractional currency only renews it, and it must be replaced by another note within a year. Sir, the wisdom of this provision is now so demonstrated that a committee of the House unanimously refuse to print the currency and demand the issue of the silver coin, while two months ago the scheme was pronounced visionary, impracticable, a sham. We are now at a specie basis for our fractional currency; and yet when the law passed we were told it would be hoarded, bought up by money-changers, exported. We are now told "Nobody wants the silver; they prefer the fractional notes." So it is, and so it will be when we approach the gold standard. Nobody will want to give up the United States notes for gold as soon as the note will buy as much as gold.

But it is said we can only buy the silver bullion by issuing bonds. That is true now, because our surplus revenue is not large; but how will the United States ever pay its notes at a cheaper rate. One million of dollars of 5 per cent. bonds will to-day buy sufficient silver bullion to make $1,200,000 in subsidiary silver coin. When and how can this operation of paying our debts be better commenced, unless we mean to postpone payment indefinitely. It has been said that the 5 per cent. bonds authorized have been exhausted. Not so. The law plain and express, and was so designed and intended, to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury not only to use any surplus revenue, but "to issue, sell, and dispose of at not less than par in coin either of the descriptions of bonds of the United States described in the act" for refunding the public debt. The refunding act is only referred to for the "description" of the bonds authorized. But to make this confor the "description" of the bonds anthorized. But to make this construction more clear, it is provided "that all provisions of law inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed." Thus, not only the public faith but all the surplus revenue and the public credit, as represented by either of three kinds of bonds, to wit, those bearing 4. 4½, and 5 per cent. interest in gold, is granted to the Secretary to enable him to execute this trust. The only limit in amount is the amount that will enable him to execute the law. The only limit of price at which he can sell the bonds, is "not less than par in coin."

The second section is only material as it tends to induce the coining of gold by repealing the mint charge.

ing of gold by repealing the mint charge.

So much of the third section as relates to national banks is not material except as it provides a way by which circulating notes may be issued; but if issued it will be with full knowledge that in due time they must be redeemed in coin at the pleasure of the holder.

Then comes the provision—the vital provision—of the law: "And on and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem in coin the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding on their presentation for redemption." Then follows the ample power already quoted: "And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for the redemption in this act authorized or required, he is authorized to use any surplus revenue from time to time in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to issue, sell, and dispose of," at not less than par in coin, either of the bonds already referred to. Such are the duties coin, detail. of the bonds already referred to. Such are the duties enjoined, and such are the powers conferred.

Sir, in this respect, both the powers and duties of this act are clearer and stronger than in the acts under which Great Britain resumed and France is now resuming. Who can doubt that with or without further legislation the work can be accomplished by a Secre-tary who will obey and execute the law? The power to "prepare" for resumption is a broad discretion that commences with the passage of the act and continues during every hour and day of its existence, but is one to be exercised with exceeding caution and moderation.

AUXILIARY LEGISLATION.

But, sir, this is not all. When Congress passes an act imposing a duty upon a public officer, it implies an obligation that it will furnish all the aid and auxiliary legislation necessary to carry it into execution. The extent and nature of this is within the discretion of Congress, but when the power conferred upon bim is ample, and the duty imposed is clear, he must act even though Congress neglect its duty to support him by auxiliary legislation.

And this brings me to the last proposition I propose to discuss, and

What additional legislation ought Congress now to adopt in aid of the law?

The Secretary of the Treasury recommends first that the legal-tender quality of the United States note be taken from it before 1879. I cannot agree to this, for the United States note is as much a contract to pay money as a bond, and we cannot take from that note any quality that gives it value until we are prepared to redeem it in coin. The proposition is too much like the act of March, 1863, already referred to, which stripped the note of its quality of convertibility into bonds.

His second recommendation is-

His second recommendation is—

That authority be given for funding legal-tender notes into bonds bearing a low rate of interest. * * It seems probable that a bond bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent. would invite the funding of a sufficient amount of legal-tender notes to lessen materially the sum of gold which, in the absence of such provision, must be accumulated in the Treasury by the 1st of January, 1879, to carry out the imperative requirements of the act of January 14, 1875. If it be apprehended that authority to the Secretary to fund an unlimited amount of notes might lead to too sudden contraction of the currency, Congress could limit the amount to be funded in any given period of time. The process being in no sense compulsory as to the holders of United States notes, and the rate of interest on the bonds being made low, it is not probable that currency which could find profitable employment would be presented for redemption in such bonds. Only the excess of notes above the needs of business would seek such conversion. Anthority to the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem and cancel two million of legal-tender notes per month by this process would greatly facilitate redemption at the time now fixed by law, and besides would have the advantage of publicity as to the exact amount to be withdrawn in any given month. Bonds issued for this purpose should be of the denomination of fifty and one hundred dollars, and any multiple thereof, in order to meet the convenience of all classes of holders of United States notes.

The President in his annual message recommends-

That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to redeem, say, not to exceed $2,000,000 monthly of legal-tender notes, by issuing in their stead a long bond, bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum, of denominations ranging from $50 to $1,000 each. This would in time reduce the legal-tender notes to avolume that could be kept afloat without demanding redemption in large sums suddenly. Third. That additional power be given to the Secretary of the Treasury to accumulate gold for final redemption, either by increasing revenue, curtailing expenses, or both—it is preferable to do both; and I recommend that reduction of expenditures be made wherever it can be done without impairing Government obligations or crippling the due execution thereof.

These recommendations substantially concurring are wise and would be efficient, and to secure them ample means are provided by the application of the sinking fund for two or three years without additional taxation. Indeed it is neither wise or prudent to apply the sinking fund to the purchase of bonds not due, at a high premium, when it may be applied according to the act creating it to the purchase of notes already due.

The honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. Morrill] has introduced a bill, and a number of other bills and propositions have been referred to the Committee on Finance; and the elaborate resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of New York are now before us.

I will not anticipate the provisions of these various propositions, except so far as to say that I will cheerfully support any measure of wise economy proposed to strengthen the public Treasury; that I will wise economy proposed to strengthen the public Treasury; that I will cheerfully vote for a moderate tax on tea and coffee, because this will increase our revenue without adding to the cost of the articles, and be the means of enabling us to repeal other taxes that are both a burden and an inconvenience, and will also strengthen the Treasury; that I will gladly vote for the voluntary conversion of a limited amount of United States notes into bonds, as each of those measures will tend to "prepare" us for a specie standard. But, sir, each of these measures, and others that may be proper, are not, in my judgment, indispensable to the full and complete execution of the law of 1875 on or before the lat day of Language, 1879. 1875 on or before the 1st day of January, 1879.

Indeed it may well be questioned whether all of them may not be properly postponed until the next session, when the deliberate judgment of Congress, guided by the sense of the people, can be rendered. I will gladly vote for them now, but we have acted together thus far and I will not unduly press upon my associates measures they do not fully approve.

Sir, I have a confident belief that if Congress will now hold fast to the law as it stands, the drift of events and the practical operation of the law will not only vindicate its wisdom, but will secure in due time every proper auxiliary legislation to carry it into full execution. The duty of the hour demands firmness and faith. There are times in the lives of nations and individuals when the temptation is strong to turn from the path of honor, to shrink from and evade the performance of obligations. Then it is more than ever that the old adage should be remembered that "honesty is the best policy." For one I feel that my course is as clear as the sunlight of heaven; and I trust that the great party to which I belong may now, as in sterner times and under greater difficulties, stand fast to the national honor pledged by it in the act of 1875; and when the difficulties inseparable from a great duty have passed away, we will be as proud of our position now as we are of the firmness and faith with which we prosecuted a great war, and secured to the people of our day and of future generations the blessings of national union and universal liberty.

I move that the memorial of the New York Chamber of Commerce be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 57) authorizing the payment of duties on imports in legal-tenders and national-bank

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, the bill under consideration provides for the payment of duties on importations in legal-tenders and national-bank notes or coin, at the option of the importer. And believing it to be not only a most important question, but the most efficient, if not the only, way by which the paper money now in circulation can be made equal to gold, and consequently in that way bring about specie resumption, I will ask the indulgence of the Senate to give as briefly as I can the reasons for this conviction. I say conviction, and not opinion, because long reflection on this subject has brought my mind to the condition of conviction, whatever may be thought by others.

I am aware of the many different views entertained on the question of resumption, and in my opinion there is more or less truth and correctness in all of them in relation to the object to be attained, excepting in the law passed on the 14th of January, 1875, providing for resumption on the 1st of January, 1879. This law I believe to be founded in error from beginning to end, and of course it will not accomplish the object desired, but, on the contrary, will defeat this complish the object desired, but, on the contrary, will defeat this object, and will, if not repealed, involve the country in great financial distress. So believing, it will be my duty on this occasion to show this, if in my power, and also to establish my position: that is, the way to resume is to give value to the paper money, which I contend would be effected by receiving it for duties on importations.

I am aware of the difficulty of the task which I here assume, and also of my poor abilities to grapple with so great and also so intricate a subject.

The question of finance cannot be treated as an isolated or abstract question in a discussion of this character. Authors, or persons who write books or essays, may do so, and such publications may, and do generally, contain a very large amount of truth, and to read and to study them is not only very advantageous, but absolutely necessary. But for the legislator the subject must be discussed in a practical way. He must examine into the condition of the country, its foreign and domestic trade, its productive capacities for creating values, and indeed many other subjects should be considered. As a discussion of this subject on this scale would lead me to too great length, I will necessarily be compelled to confine myself to the condition of the country as it is affected by its foreign commerce.

By the act of the 14th of January, 1875, we are required to resume specie payment on the 1st of January, 1879, upon all the paper money issued by the Government; that is, the fractional currency and the legal-tender notes, amounting in the aggregate to $417,205,959.66. To effect this the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to sell bonds for coin, so as to have it ready on hand when resumption day comes. I hold this to be impossible; and to sustain this I will first quote from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury made to us at the beginning of this session. He says:

It may perhaps be doubted whether the process of accumulating a large amount of gold by a given time could go on without meeting opposition from the financial powers of the world.

He further says:

It is safe to say that so large an amount of gold as would be required to carry out this purpose and direction of the act cannot suddenly be acquired. It can be done only by gradual processes and by taking advantage of favorable conditions from time to time.

Taking this view of the Secretary to be correct, (and it undoubtedly is,) it is very clear that no sudden accumulation can be made. It has to be gradual if at all. And, if gradual, how can it be done? Can this be effected with the revenue derived through the custom-house and the internal revenue? It is not certainly worth while to discuss this, for we all know that the entire revenues are now absolutely required to pay the expenses of the Government. The coin, whether gold or silver, annually furnished by the mines of Nevada, Utah, Colorado, and ver, annually furnished by the mines of Nevada, Utah, Colorado, and California, certainly cannot be used for this purpose, for the simple reason that this product belongs to individuals, and can be obtained by the Government only by way of purchase. There is, indeed, no way in the world by which this amount of coin can be realized except by the selling of bonds. Then the question comes up right square, can the bonds be sold, and this amount of coin realized? Where can this amount be sold? Surely not at home, for the coin is not here. Can this he done abroad? in the countries where bonds have heretefore this be done abroad? in the countries where bonds have heretofore been sold? That is, in France, Germany, or England. Would the capitalists of either or all of these countries be willing to part with this amount of coin for an equal amount of our bonds? Would they agree to this gold depletion, which would be certain to involve them in a financial panic? I say, surely not. I hold this is beyond any doubt an impossibility. The relations of the commercial world are at this day of telegraph and rapid communication so intimate, particularly between this country and Europe, that any great financial convulsion in any one is immediately felt in all. With no captious spirit, but, on the contrary, with a sincere and honest purpose to find out if this could be done in the way proposed, I am compelled to say that I look upon this as utterly impracticable. To do this gradually in the way proposed by the Secretary would involve us in as great trouble. We need $400,000,000. Could this amount be withdrawn from the circulation of the world and be gradually accumulated so as to be ready for the day of resumption?

At this period of the world's history, and of such vast and extended commercial transactions, every dollar in coin is needed and has to be actively employed to fulfill its mission. Although paper exists in large quantities both in France and England, yet in both of these countries this paper is based upon coin, ready and on hand in case it is required to maintain the regular value of the paper. To gradually accumulate coin and lock it up in the vaults of our sub-Treasury would lead to the most serious and disastrous consequences. ing this I am sustained by the Secretary of the Treasury. He says:

Such an amount can be procured with difficulty, and not without embarrassing effect upon the trade and commerce of our own and other countries.

The effect, indeed, would be so embarrassing as to render this an utter impossibility.

Resumption in the way I have spoken I look upon as impossible. Resumption in the way I have spoken I look upon as impossible. This view, I think, is sustained by the Secretary, and hence he proposes the issue of a bond at 4 per cent. with which to gradually redeem and cancel the legal-tender notes; and this he proposes to do gradually. This proposition in the main coincides with the view of the President as contained in his last annual message, and also with the bill offered by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] In accordance with this, the legal-tenders are gradually to disappear from circulation, and the amount now outstanding to be represented by an early amount of bonds say $400.000. Grant that this can by an equal amount of bonds, say $400,000,000. Grant that this can be done, the question then necessarily presents itself, in what condition would it place the country? With all the legal-tender notes out of existence, and our bonded debt increased the large amount of $400,000,000, with no gold in the country more than we have now, there would be nothing left with which to carry on the business of the country but national-bank notes. Grant again that the amount of this character of paper would increase as the demand for it re-quired; and grant further that this amount would be equal to the wants of trade. I take it as an accepted fact that no one believes that the trade and commerce of this country can be done with a fair degree of prosperity with less than $500,000,000, whether this amount be coin or paper. We have, it is said, $150,000,000 of coin in this country, (my own belief is that we have not by many millions this amount;) but let that be as it may, I will concede that we have. The question is again squarely presented, how could these national banks sustain themselves? Their notes would not be received in pay ment of duties, nor be legal tenders; and yet resumption day having come and past, the banks would necessarily be required to redeem their notes in coin or be depreciated to a ruinous degree. Under these circumstances would we be nearer specie payment than we are now? According to my view of this mode of bringing about specie resumption, to attempt it would not only be a failure, but would involve this country in distress and ruin, and specie payment would be postponed indefinitely.

We read that the Argonauts sent Jason in the ship Argo to the coast of Colchis to secure and bring back to his country the golden fleece. Now, Mr. President, if we could send to Ophir or Golconda or Australia a vessel for a cargo of gold, and the gold procured and brought safely to New York and deposited in the sub-Treasury and with it the legal-tender notes all paid and canceled, yet resumption, in my opinion, would not be permanent; and even this operation, splendid and dazzling as it appears to be, would really be disastrous. I cannot believe that permanent resumption can be effected by any sudden effort of this character. When it does come, it must be in the way of a gradual growth, the consequence and reflex of the trade and commerce of the country, and only when this trade and commerce are prosperous. There is no healthy sudden growth in nature. Everything around us, both in the vegetable and animal world, is of gradual growth, and when not gradual is unhealthy, and is like a boil on the human body. With the exception of Minerva, who sprang full-grown and armed cap-a-pie from the broad brain of Jupiter, everything else has had a birth and gradual growth.

I will now say a few words about our foreign commerce, and our indebtedness abroad.

The balance of trade (not including coin) against us, as per report of the Secretary of the Treasury in 1875, $19,562,725

was

Bonded debt of the United States on November 1, 1875, $1,765,198,812; the interest on these bonds annually, $99,339,101. It will be admitted that fully one-half of these bonds are held abroad, the interest on which

The railroads of this country owe a debt of $2,230,766,108, of which $2,000,000,000 are in bonds. From the best information which can be had on this subject, one half of these bonds are held abroad, but so as to be within bounds I will say only 40 per cent., or $800,000,000,

Making a total of...... 146, 346, 390

To this large sum of $146,346,390 might well be added the debt created by the fact that about 70 per cent. of our imports are received in foreign vessels, the gross tonnage of which is 8,000,000; but I will assume only one-half, or 4,000,000 tons, at $15 per ton, is $60,000,000. It is also a fact that Europeans have large investments in this country in our railroads, banks, manufacturing companies, mining, &c. The dividends from these amount to many millions a year. To these might be added the millions expended by Americans traveling in Euspecified by Allertans taveling in Europe. It is therefore reasonable to say that we have to provide fully $200,000,000 as the balance against us every year. The product of our mines last year was $74,401,000. After sending abroad all the product of these mines we will yet be owing to foreigners fully $130,000,000. This large balance has heretofore been met with bonds, and in that way our foreign indebtedness has for years been all the time increasing many millions, and that every year. This has been stopped and is one of the great reasons of the hard times throughout this country. Under these circumstances, I say that resumption in the way provided by the present law is an impossibility, and if we did resume it could continue but a short time, as the necessity to pay this foreign debt would take out the gold, it being the only thing with which we can

Then are we never to resume I I would regret to answer this question in the affirmative, for I believe resumption is possible, provided we do not diminish the paper money, now a legal tender, but, on the contrary, appreciate its value, and this can be done by taking it for all debts due the Government, including duties on imports. remain, as it should and must, the measure of value. It certainly would not go out any faster to foreign countries if paper was received would not go out any laster to foreign countries it paper was received in payment of duties than it does now. Indeed it can be demonstrated from official data that our coin is diminishing, having lost in the last year perhaps $25,000,000. This I say can be proven, but I will not detain the Senate at this time to do so. While we all admit that resumption is most desirable, and, I am satisfied, desired by a large portion of the country East and West, nevertheless it would not be wise to bring this about at the expense of the prosperity of the country; for it is only through prosperity that permanent resumption can take place. Nations in this respect do not differ from individuals. The man in debt can never pay unless he makes money, and he can not make money unless he be prosperous.

According to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, there was According to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, there was a great decrease of exports last year in many of the leading articles, namely: Agricultural implements, $464,381; hogs, $886,622; bacon and hams, $4,771,295; Indian corn, $313,014, corn-meal, $238,866; rye, $1,363,772; wheat, $41,813,596. I could enumerate many other articles, but it is sufficient to say that last year our exports of domestic goods decreased $70,149,321, while during the same period the exportation of specie and bullion was greater than that for the preceding year by $25,501,737. The condition of our foreign trade is deplorable, and here lies the lion in the path of resumption. This has to change before you can under the present law resume; for if there is no change the coin will not remain here in sufficient quantities unless you appreciate your paper money in the way I have already stated; but. appreciate your paper money in the way I have already stated; but, you do appreciate it, resumption is possible, as it will take but very little coin with good credit to sustain it.

I will here very briefly reply to a portion of the speech of the Senator from Ohio as to the balance of trade. He states that it is one of the errors of the day to argue against a balance of trade, and quotes the economist, Mr. McCulloch, and furthermore states that the balance of trade is now and has been for many years against England. Although the publications do apparently sustain such a statement, yet when the subject is properly analyzed, it will be found not to be correct. The balance of trade is not now and has never been against England. It would require but a very brief moment to decide the question. The population of England is limited, and is less than 30,000,000. It has great productive capacity in itself, and it carries a

ommerce with the world.

The publications which are made annually apparently sustain this idea; but this is easily explained. It is what is called the apparent balance of trade; that is, you put down the exports at what they are worth at home and not what is realized abroad at an advance of from 25 to 50 per cent., while the value of the importations is calculated in the port of entry with all the charges added. The question of imports and exports must also always be examined with reference to the coin or bullion, and it will be found that a large amount of the so-called imports consists of coin or bullion and not of raw materials

England to-day is the creditor nation of the world, and that fact is at the bottom and underlies all her systems of tariffs. The fact that she is a creditor nation is the reason why she has changed her legal standard from gold and silver to gold alone, so as to become the recipient of gold. It is not possible for any nation to maintain its coin at home so long as the balance of trade is against it. For this balance has to be paid, and it can only be settled and liquidated with coin or bullion. For the words "balance of trade" simply mean that amount which remains due after all the exports (besides coin) have been accounted for.

Now, sir, the balance of trade is against us; and I hold this to be not a chimera, not a figment of the brain, but a great fact; and, until we fully appreciate it, we are not in a position to examine very correctly the financial problem.

The time has come when we must open our eyes and see our condition and understand our commercial relations with the balance of the world. We must begin to realize the fact that we are the only export more and import less, and until we do it resumption is impossible. nation on earth which offers a market for all other nations. We must

Paper money is a necessity in modern times. It is indispensable to Paper money is a necessity in modern times. It is indispensable to commerce, but it must be paper whose value is regulated by coin, and be at all times convertible, and as long as it is convertible conversion practically is not required, excepting to a limited extent, as the paper is in fact more convenient, excepting to pay foreign debts. Therefore our policy should be to diminish as much as possible this foreign debt. This can only be done in two ways: export more or import less. If you import less and your consumption remains the same, it will give employment to your own operatives, who will not, like the foreign require coin for their next but will take paper not like the foreign, require coin for their pay, but will take paper, not from necessity, but as being truly better for them. If your importa-tions were decreased the small amount of $50,000,000 and exports in-creased the same amount annually, we would be in a healthy condi-Our exports cannot be much increased for very obvious reasons, excepting it be with South America.

I have often heard our condition compared to that of France, and I have also heard that, as France was able to resume, we should be able to do so likewise. The comparison is not correct. While the balance of trade is against us, and consequently our coin all the time going away from us, it is largely in favor of France, and coin consequently all the time flowing to her shores. Hence, although the indemnity of $1,000,000,000 was paid by her to Prussia in coin, the derangement was only temporary; and why? For the reason that soon after the payment of the coin it began to return to France and to leave Prussia. The result was that with the increase of coin in France prosperity was daily restored, while as it left Prussia it produced a daily strain and depression, which has resulted in a state of unparalleled embarrassment and hard times in that country. The period provided by law for resumption in France has not yet come, yet virtually resump-

The Senator from Vermont the other day advanced two other arguments why my bill should not pass. One was the effect it would have on the tariff, and the other that it was a violation of the faith of the nation, by which we gave a pledge to collect duties in coin to pay interest on our bonds, and also to keep up the sinking fund. Having already spoken at some length, I am compelled to leave the argument in relation to the tariff unanswered. And as to the other reason, I will say that while it is true that our contract is to pay coin, it is of no consequence whether we get that coin in one way or another. The credit of this nation is high and deservedly so, and it is not necessary, as it might be with a small and weak nation, to pledge any particular fund; it will be sufficient if we do the thing. If we pay regularly and do it in coin, our credit will not suffer because we choose to change this law.

I have great objection to increase our already very large bonded debt, and this for several reasons. First, bonds go abroad, and the consequence is our debt is held by foreigners, and the semi-annual interest which has to be sent across the ocean makes us poor now and will keep us poor as long as this debt remains unpaid. and will keep us poor as long as this debt remains inpaid. Second, it pays no tax; the consequence is that the richest men in this country, those having large sums invested in this kind of security, do not contribute anything toward supporting the Government, building in this way a privileged class; and in proportion as this class is relieved from tax, the burden of the other is increased. Neither France nor England could exist for a year in the condition of only research by presenting if their debt was not all consider them. reasonable prosperity if their debt was not all owned at home. Reither of these nations are impoverished, as nations, by their large debt. But Spain, Portugal, Italy, and Turkey are kept down by their debt, which is owned abroad. It was one of the great efforts made by Cavour, one of the greatest statesmen of modern times, to keep the debt then being rapidly created for the new kingdom of Italy, at home and to be held by its own citizens; and had he not died, I had that faith in his great abilities and mental resources, I think it very likely that he would have succeeded. I therefore think that the interest on all new bonds should be made payable at home. This it is true will not prevent them from being owned abroad, but it will be one step in the right direction.

Recognizing as I do, and have always done, coin as the only measure of value, I am desirous to see the day when it will be used for that purpose, and not, as it is now, as merchandise. Paper money is a nepurpose, and not, as it is now, as merchandise. Paper money is a necessity of modern times, and grows out of the limitless amount of commercial transactions between citizens of the same State and between citizens of different States. To carry on these immense transactions there is not coin enough in the world, however much it has increased within a few years. The estimated amount at the time Columbus first landed on the shores of the New World was $170,000,000. The exclusive use of coin is rendered still more difficult by the fact that while formerly silver and coin were used by all the leading commercial nations of the world now in most of these countries gold alone is record. nations of the world, now in most of these countries gold alone is recognized. It is but recently that silver was demonetized in Germany; this being caused by the large amount of gold brought there by the payment of the French indemnity. The German statesmen believed that this large amount of gold would remain there; while the French statesmen, being more practical and I think better financiers, believed it would soon be returning to their country, as in fact it did. The consequence is, their silver being demonetized and the gold having gone back to France, Germany is left with a very small amount of coin, and the country is thereby forced into a state of financial depression without a precedent, while France is very prosperous.

While the tendency among the principal nations is unmistakably to the adoption of gold as the measure and standard of value, yet I am impressed with the conviction that, as our mines produce annually a very large amount of silver, we might very wisely return to the double standard of gold and silver to a limited amount. Gold is now the exclusive standard in Great Britain and Ireland, Australian colonies, and indeed most of the colonies of the British Empire; as also in Portugal, Turkey, Egypt, and a few of the South American states—as Chili and Brazil. As already stated, it has recently been established in the German Empire, as also in the Scandinavian kingdoms of Denmark, Sweden and Norway. The double standard is still maintained in France, Italy, Belgium, Switzerland, Spain, Greece, Austria, Russia, all the numerous Asiatic peoples, and in some of the South American republics, as Peru, Ecuador, and New Granada. Formerly in most of countries silver was the only coin, and gold Formerly in most of countries silver was the only coin, and gold circulated as a sort of commercial money. Until 1853 the silver dollar of the United States Mint was a standard coin of unrestricted legal tender, concurrently with the gold coinage of eagles and their fractions. The legal ratio of silver to gold was 16 to 1, while in France the ratio was 15½ to 1, which caused the exportation of silver from this country to that. This was however remedied in 1853 by reducing the half dollar and smaller pieces to the condition of token coins, and the dollar was practically suppressed. Our coinage act came into operation on the 1st of April, 1873, and constituted the gold one-dollar piece the sole unit of value, while it restricted the legal tender of the new silver trade-dollar and the half dollar and subdivisions to an amount not exceeding $5 in one payment. Thus the double standard amount not exceeding $5 in one payment. Thus the double standard previously existing was finally abolished, and the United States as usual was influenced by Great Britain in making gold coin the only standard. This suits England, but does not suit us. I think with our large silver-producing capacity we should return to the double standard, at least in part, and this will constitute one of the means by which we will be enabled to resume specie payments.

I feel that I have detained the Senate already too long, and I will therefore now as briefly as possible give my views how to bring about resumption. The corner-stone of my argument will be, to restore as soon as possible the prosperity of the country, holding that without prosperity in every branch of business, commercial, manufacturing, farming, domestic and foreign trade, to attempt to resume would not only not be successful, but would involve the country in great financial trouble. We must adopt a system which the mind of the country will look upon as permanent, so as to justify capital and capitalists to seek investments without the constant danger standing before their eyes that a change in the financial policy by Congress might involve them in ruin.

I would, therefore, let it be understood that the present laws in relation to the legal-tender notes and national-bank notes would remain permanent and under no circumstances any contraction of the former, and an increase of the latter as the business wants of the country might call for. Then I would receive in payment of duties on importations the legal-tender notes, although my bill provides for taking of both, my object being at the time I introduced it to elicit the views of others on the proposition. It may be thought that if we take one kind of paper, and not the other, the one not taken will detake one kind of paper, and not the other, the one not taken will depreciate. This I answer would not be the case, as the one not taken is by law convertible in the other. And there being about the same quantity outstanding of both, this conversion would not be difficult to make if desired. I would then take as security for the circulation of the national banks a bond of 4 or  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., and in that way release the bonds now deposited, worth from sixty to eighty millions premium or that amount more than their face. I would then increase the legal-tender character of silver to the sum of \$1,000 in one payment, thereby giving to this metal which we are now producing in our mines. thereby giving to this metal, which we are now producing in our mines in such large quantities; the largest capacity of usefulness, without at the same time driving out of the country the gold coin. I would then require the national banks to set aside as a part of their reserve the gold interest received on these bonds, which would emancipate an equal amount of paper now held as a reserve. One year after the passage of the act, I would require the banks to redeem in silvertheir notes presented in sums not exceeding \$100, and after two years to redeem in gold in sums of like amount.

By doing away with the large demand for gold to pay duties, amounting annually to between one hundred and fifty and one hunamounting annually to between one influence and inty and one influence dred and sixty millions of dollars, and creating a demand for precisely of like amount for legal-tenders, the difference between the two would soon disappear; that being so—that is, gold not worth a premium—it would be an easy thing for the Government to procure the fifty millions needed to pay the home-due-interest coupons, as the coupons due abroad are provided for by the purchase of exchange, as is always done, and not by the shipment of coin; this exchange can be bought with legal-tenders. There is now, or was on 1st of December, a report of the Secretary, in the Treasury, over and above all liabilities for coin certificates or certificates of deposit, almost forty millions of dollars, within ten millions of enough to pay the home-due interest for one year to come. But in the worse possible view, even if the Government had to buy the coin necessary to pay the interest, it would be better to do it than to keep all the paper now in circulation depreciated from 12 to 15 per cent. all the time.

am aware of the argument which is always advanced by the party which is all the time professing the greatest-regard for the mainte-nance of the public faith, but which, while always professing, does nothing to maintain it: that to discontinue the collection of duties on nothing to maintain it: that to discontinue the collection of duties on imports in coin would be a violation of law and of our plighted faith. Surely this is not correct. Our contract, as I have already said, is to pay our interest in coin; and it is of no consequence to the holders of our bonds how we get the money, provided we get it honestly.

The argument is advanced by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Morrill] that, if you do away with any demand for coin, it will not remain here, but will naturally go to the countries where it is needed. This, to my mind, is the only argument advanced in opposition to the taking of legal-tenders in payment of duties which is at all maintainable. But will the facts sustain the argument, for I admit, if there was a country where coin was not in use at all, either as a if there was a country where coin was not in use at all, either as a measure of value or a circulating medium, that none would be found in that country. But in this case the Government would require not less than fifty millions to pay the home-due coupons. And as it is a legal tender for all debts to any amount, there would always be some very considerable demand for it. In addition to this, the Government will need annually 1 per cent. of the entire debt for the sink-The demand for gold coin would still be very large, fully as large as the supply, for this supply cannot be large with this large balance standing against us, and for which we have to remit every year.

This country at this time is terribly depressed; every branch of busiof this paralysis is owing to the present resumption law. However important I believe it to be for the prosperity of this country that we should at some day or other, no matter how distant, resume specie payment, nevertheless, between the two evils of making no provision looking to that end and the continuance of this law, I would unhesitatingly say, repeal the law immediately. Without any law for providing for resumption we could get along, but if this law remains unrepealed I believe the country will be driven into universal and widespread bankruptcy.

I will now briefly recapitulate what I have said. I hold it would be of the greatest importance to the prosperity of the country that a condition of statu quo be maintained; that is, that as we have at this day some $3:3,000,000 of legal tenders authorized by law, I would let that amount remain as permanent; so that the capital of the country may know and rely on this as a fixed fact, as I believe the legal-tender notes of this country, with resumption at some future day, to be the best paper money in the world.

Without on this occasion advocating the system of national banks as being a good one, I accept the fact of their existence and that they have now in circulation some $350,000,000 of notes. These notes are found in every part of the country, and permeate every channel of trade and commerce, and are paid and received by everybody and for every transaction that takes place between man and man in the United States. In addition to this, these banks have now a discount-list amounting to a thousand million of dollars. I hold, therefore, that to disturb this state of things, and compel them to contract either their issue or their discounts, would bring about a great catastrophe, and be ruinous to the debtor class. Hence, without advocating the system of national banks, I accept the fact and legislate accordingly; and when the banks, I accept the fact and legislate accordingly; and when the democratic party gets into power, as I think it will very soon, we will, I hope, be able to inaugurate a better policy. The national banks are unpopular in my section of the country. In my own State, and throughout the West and South, they are far from being popular. I believe, however, that a good deal of this unpopularity is owing to a misconception of the system, while the one which they desire to be substituted in lieu of it would prove perhaps a snare, and instead of being a benefit would be very destructive. But I repeat, let this be as it may, I only look to the fact that these banks are now in existence; and, as the country is in a state of great financial depression. I would not as the country is in a state of great financial depression, I would not just now advocate any change. The future will take care of this; we are now dealing with the present.

The balance of trade being in favor of England, it became the policy of that country to make gold the exclusive standard, so that it should become the recipient of the gold of the world, and this to a great extent is the fact at this day. Year by year the increase of gold coin in that country has been very great, and this has existed for many years; but for the last twenty years this increase has been very rapid, being the result of this policy of making gold the exclusive standard. But we, instead of being a creditor nation, are a debtor people. We ought to be the creditor, but I am sorry to say we are not. Instead of gold flowing to our shores, it is from day to day leaving us, to go not only to England, but to nearly every other portion of the globe; and, although we produced last year some $70,000,000 of bullion from our mines, we now have $25,000,000 less coin than we had a year ago, while England has many millions more.

I have heard it said, not once but frequently, that the best thing to pay our foreign debt with was coin or bullion. But this, in my opinion, is not correct. It will pay a debt, it is true; but if you can imagine a nation that would do nothing else but dig from the bowels of the earth the precious metals it would soon become a poor people indeed.

We are producing in this country this year, as estimated by Dr. Linderman, some $40,000,000 in silver bullion. He estimates the total production at $80,000,000, of which $40,000,000 will be silver. Why not utilize this silver as a legal tender? I admit that if it is made a legal tender equal to gold, it being a metal not so valuable, it would ultimately drive the gold from the country and the silver alone would remain here. By limiting it to a thousand dollars in one payment, ninety-nine transactions out of every hundred will be transacted with it. And all business between individuals not bankers, and between the mechanic and employer, between farmers and their merchants, and all wages, and indeed thousands of transactions which underlie and all wages, and indeed thousands of transactions which inderine society broad and deep, would be in this coin. The large transactions between bankers and those between this and foreign nations would continue to be in gold, but the silver would remain here as the coin of the people and the laboring man as well as of the small dealer, of the people and the laboring man as wen as of the small dealer, and indeed of all those persons who do not deal in millions at a clip.

I therefore, Mr. President, look upon this as one of the great steps toward resumption. It is by utilizing the silver which we produce in large amounts in this country and making it a legal tender as it was heretofore. It remains a legal tender in France, and it is there successful as the coin of the people. It is also a legal tender in many other parts of Europe. France is one of the great commercial nations, and there they have retained the double standard; and from my readand there they have retained the double standard; and from my reading I believe if Germany could go back to the double standard it would do it most readily and cheerfully. They believed that the large amount of French gold which had been brought there in a day would remain, and so believing they demonetized all the millions of silver that had been coined in all the little principalities and duchies of Germany for ages before and substituted gold exclusively, recoining the French coin so as to make it the coin of the empire. But this imperial coin went back to its former home; and, as I said a while ago, it has left that country in a condition of paralysis and prostration not surpassed by its sad coulding during the Naveleonic were tion not surpassed by its sad condition during the Napoleonic wars. It should be received as a fundamental fact, so as to guide the states-men of this country, that the reverse of what suits England always suits us. And as the exclusive gold standard undoubtedly suits her, the double standard suits us.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Will the Senator allow me to ask a single question? I understood the Senator to say that he would regard the policy to be pursued here as exactly the opposite of that to be pursued by Great Britain. I would like to inquire of the senator to say the senator to say that the senator to say that he would regard the policy to be pursued here as exactly the opposite of that to be pursued by Great Britain. I would like to inquire of the Senator what he would say in regard to the doctrines of free trade, which are so much advocated by British statesmen?

Mr. BOGY. I understand the question, and also the motive of the Senator. He desires to commit me on that subject, and I have no ob-I look upon free trade as the legitimate child of England, begotten for the particular benefit of that country, but which through English intellect and English energy, with English money, has been impressed on the world, including our own country.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am glad to say that I find the Senator at least sound on one point.

Mr. BOGY. Yet what the Senator may consider sound for Vermont may not be so understood in Missouri without explanation. The question of a tariff at this day as a pure party question should not exist. The wants of this country are so great, amounting to three hundred millions a year, that revenue is a matter of necessity; and the only way to get this is through the custom-house. Whether that revenue be obtained by a high protective tariff, or an ad valorem or revenue tariff, are points of discussion on which we might very well not agree, and upon which I presume I would disagree with my friend from Vermont. Nevertheless this I will say, that the present tariff is unjust to the West. Within my day I remember well when we did not raise food enough to supply the large emigration yearly coming into the valley of the Mississippi, and now we have a great surplus. Hence these questions have all got to be re-examined and re-investigated; and without being a protective-tariff man I am free to say that I am not a free-trade man. When England saw the necessity for her to become the manufacturing nation for the world, it was evidently her policy to strike down and destroy all the manufactures of the other nations so that she might supply the demand. And as she could not do without cheap food for her operatives, she advocated its importation free of duty.

In conclusion, I will say that I am in favor of resumption, but my idea of effecting this is not by sending a vessel abroad to get gold, or by selling of bonds, but by making the paper as valuable as coin, and thus rendering conversion unnecessary; and unless we do this, in the condition we are now in, as regards our foreign trade, and in view of the fact that we are owing millions abroad of Federal bonds, State bonds, railroad bonds, city bonds, and county bonds, and as a large amount of coin cannot be kept here, resumption as proposed is utterly out of the question. Gold will go, and must go, to pay these debts. The only way then, as I have already said, is to appreciate the paper money.

Marke process over the second part of

The Senator from Ohio spoke in eloquent terms of the duty of the Government to redeem its plighted faith as regards the bonds, and also its duty to pay these notes in coin. Sir, it is still more the duty of the Government not to depreciate its own issue while it compels you and me and all the people of the United States to take it nolens volens. The Government itself discredits its own issue, and so long as tremains thus discredited it will necessarily be below par; but receive it for all dues and the day will not be distant when no man will give up a twenty-dollar greenback for a twenty-dollar gold coin. The argument that it will affect the tariff is not legitimate, as we are not adjusting a tariff but trying to make the paper in circulation equal to coin. That we are breaking faith with the world, as is said by the opponents of this bill, is not founded in reason or truth, because the essence of our contract is to pay again, and if we shall essence of our contract is to pay coin; and if we shall continue to pay in coin we maintain our contract, finally protect the banks so that they will not be compelled to contract their issues or curtail their discounts and enlarge the legal-tender capacity of silver to the amount of $1,000 in one payment, and I believe we will have laid the foundation of $1,000 in one payment, and I believe we will have laid the foundation for resumption on a broad and healthy scale which will lead to the early prosperity of the country.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I noticed that the Senator from Missouri commented on what he was pleased to call "the Morrill tariff." I desire to say merely that that was a nickname applied to it in order to kill the measure, when it so happened, it is true, that the tariff bill of 1861 was introduced by me. But the Senator complains of its injustice in that it did not give the West a higher rate of duty upon hides and wool. That tariff, if he will examine it, did put the duties at a higher rate both on hides and wool than was levied by a democratic administration. It has always been the policy of all the tariffs I have ever advocated, or had anything to do with, to maintain that idea, that the farmers of the country were to be benefited as well that idea, that the farmers of the country were to be benefited as well as the manufacturers. The tariffs that have been adopted since 1861 have been war measures, simply for the purpose of increasing the revenue of the country, and not for the purpose of protection at all, except incidentally. I therefore am very glad to find that, although the Senator from Missouri has charged that the tariff sometimes called the Morrill tariff has been unjust to the West, yet in the very particular description. ulars mentioned by him it was an increase upon the duties that existed ulars mentioned by him it was an increase upon the duties that existed prior to its passage.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I do not propose at this time to discuss the bill presented by my honorable friend from Missouri, or to follow the line of argument adopted by the honorable Senator from Ohio. I simply wish to say that unless some Senator who is better entitled than I am to the public ear and the public attention shall within a very short time introduce what I regard as a proper bill for the resumption of specie payments, I shall take the liberty of introducing one of that character. That the bill of last year has not succeeded, is true; that the bill of last year cannot succeed, in my judgment is true, because the great laws of trade, which govern all questions of finance, as the laws of nature govern the physical world, are outraged by the bill of 1875.

Mr. President, I am led to say a word here. We are called upon by that bill to resume specie payments in 1879 without any regard to the laws which govern trade. As well might a man agree to-day that on the 1st day of January, 1879, he would skate across the Potomac River without regard to the laws of nature which govern whether there shall be ice or not over that river. The duty of Congress is a plain duty, and that is to so legislate that hereafter, at the earliest practicable moment when the laws of trade will warrant it, we shall practicable moment when the laws of trade will warrant it, we shall practicable moment when the laws of trade will warrant it, we shall resume specie payments, whether it be in 1876 or 1877 or 1878 or 1879 or 1880 or 1881 or 1882. It is easy enough to talk about resuming on the first day of any given year, but I would predict that if you did it you would suspend on the first day of the succeeding month.

I only desire to say now this one thing: Let us legislate wisely, taking into consideration the condition of the country, taking into consideration the fact that we are to-day the great debtor nation of the world. Let us begin this year to lay aside what is necessary in order to resume some day, and let us continue that until the paper dollar has appreciated to the gold dollar and resumption cannot be avoided. It is a matter which the laws of trade must govern; and as I said, sir, unless some elder Senator, elder on this floor, as I trust some one sir, unless some elder Senator, elder on this floor, as I trust some one will, shall within the coming fortnight introduce a bill of that character, I shall take the liberty of doing it myself, and then I shall ask to be heard upon the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will retake its place on the Calendar. The resolution of the Senator from Indiana in regard to the admission of Mr. Pinchback will resume its place as the unfinished business, pending which the Chair will lay before the Senate a message from the President of the United States.

ARRESTS IN ALASKA.

The message was read, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

In answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 7th of January last, requesting a "statement of the number of military arrests made in the Territory of Alaska during the past five years, together with the date of each, the charge on which made in each case, the names of the persons arrested, and the period and character of the imprisonment of each in that Territory before trial or surrender to civil authorities for trial," I have the honor to submit herewith the report of the Acting Secretary of War.

Mr. KELLEY demanded tellers.

Tellers were refused.

Mr. CASON demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. KELLEY. Is it in order to move to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. The motion to go into committee has prevailed.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SAYLER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the special order, which is House bill No. 612, to carry into effect a convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, signed on the 30th day of January, 1875, on which the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] is entitled to the floor.

HAWAIIAN TREATY.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. In the remarks which I had the honor to submit to the consideration of the committee a few days since, I at-tempted to show that this was one of the most important questions which has been brought to the attention of the House at this session, and that it should be considered with care, and with that gravity which every subject referring to our international relations with other powers should command. Upon that occasion I attempted to meet certain objections which had been presented in the minority report and other objections emanating from other quarters. I think I conclusively demonstrated that the apparent loss of revenue was exceedingly magnified in amount, and that even though it were not magnified it was based upon a hypothesis, a supposition, upon a contingency which might never occur; and further, that admitting the grounds which I maintained were untenable, the loss of revenue claimed could not of itself possibly be an objection to a treaty when the advantages were so preponderating in favor of its adoption. I was interrupted, sir, which possibly is a matter of little importance, and it is only important to myself because it compels me to continue under disadvantageous circumstances the argument which I was then making to the committee.

In the minority report there is a very grave declaration which, if it be sustained, is of itself, in my judgment, sufficiently important to justify the defeat of this bill. That is, that there are provisions in this pending treaty which will compel the United States to grant like privileges in the admission of the products of other countries or nations with which we have existing commercial treaties; or, in other words, that there is a conflict between this treaty and the obligations of the Government in existing treaties which would compel the United States to admit their products upon like conditions free of duty into the ports of the United States. Now, if this objection to the treaty be well founded, if this declaration really be true, why, sir, I shall not advocate the treaty.

I will read from the minority report in order that the Committee of the Whole may fully understand the declaration which is made:

The undersigned further show that, by treaties already in existence with other sugar-growing countries, the same exemption from duties upon sugars grown in such countries will accrue to them as is allowed by this treaty to the Hawaiian

Sir, I might dismiss this declaration with the simple statement that some of the most eminent statesmen of this country who have presided over the State Department have made such a treaty as this with the Hawaiian Islands, subsequent to the treaties referred to as in conflict. William L. Marcy, one of the ablest and most eminent statesmen that this country has produced, made just such a treaty in When Secretary of State under President Pierce, Mr. Marcy made a treaty almost in the very language of this treaty, including in its schedules precisely the same articles that are included in this, sugar being one of them. And it is almost impossible, sir, that Mr. Marcy and President Pierce and the statesmen of that day could have overlooked the fact that they were making a treaty in conflict with existing treaties made with other countries.

This example was followed under President Lincoln by Mr. Seward, then Secretary of State, who made a treaty in precisely the same language, with schedules containing the same articles. According to these objectors, it appears that he was not conscious of the fact that he was acting in conflict with existing treaties. Therefore I could dismiss this objection to the Hawaiian treaty upon the reasonable assumption that there is nothing in it; because if it were well founded it is impossible that statesmen so eminent and so familiar with all the treaties of the United States could have made another treaty, or proposed to make one which would bring them in conflict with other governments with which we had existing treaties. But, sir, I will not rest upon that. I do not propose to advocate this measure because any other man from the foundation of the Government has advocated it. I do not go to precedent nor to predecessor. I take the treaty upon its merits as it stands. I am ready here to meet every objection, from every quarter, of every character, that any gentleman in this House or elsewhere may produce against it.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman from New York not permit me to ask him to name the treaties to which he has referred?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. If my friend will be patient—I know the rebuff he has just received from the House has irritated him-Mr. KELLEY. Not in the least.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. If the gentleman will be patient he will have his answer.

Mr. KELLEY. I will modify my question.
Mr. WOOD, of New York. The minority report has omitted to state with what countries we would come in conflict by making this treaty.

By this table it will be seen that nearly all the sugar imp Francisco comes from Manila, Batavia, and Honolulu.

It does not name the nations with which we have existing treaties that will be interfered with by this treaty. They say:

The undersigned further show that by treaties already in existence.

Do they state with what countries or the nature of the treaties? Do they refer to them? Do they give us any reference as authority for a statement so bold as that? No, sir. Well, I will do it for them.

I hold in my hand a volume containing all the treaties of every character made by our Government with foreign nations since July 4, 1776, down to 1873. This volume, after giving in extense and verbatim every treaty, then contains an analytical index of the peculiar conditions of each, including those of a commercial character like this. On page 1103 of this volume I find under the head of "commercial agreements," a list of those of this character and an enumeration of the countries with which there are treaties providing that

Articles, the growth, produce, or manufactures of the one party, imported into the territories of the other, are to be subject to no other or higher duties than those imposed on the like articles of any other foreign country.

It is this article, existing in substance in many of our commercial treaties, which has misled gentlemen and induces them to think that it will of itself be sufficient to give those nations with which we have such agreements certain rights not now granted, if we make this treaty and admit articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the Sandwich Islands free of duty into the ports of the United States. But there are other articles and stipulations not quoted in all of the existing treaties; and one of them is to the effect that, if such a concession shall be made to a foreign government gratuitously or freely without equivalent, like concession shall be made by them; but, if made for a "compensation, it shall be adjusted by mutual agreement," thus making it a matter of arrangement, in which case, of course, we should be satisfied and content.

But, sir, there is no practical importance to this objection if it had any valid existence. The countries with which we have such treaties are Austria, the Argentine Confederacy, Bolivia, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Great Britain, Guatemala, Hanover, Mecklenburg, Oldenburg, the Hanseatic Republics, the Hawaiian Islands, Hayti, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Orange Free State, Ottoman Porte, Portugal, Prussia, Russia, San Salvador, Sardinia, Swiss Confederation, and the Two Sicilies.

There are a few and but a few of these countries, and these I shall specifically refer to, which grow sugar the only article which would specifically refer to, which grow sugar, the only article which would be deemed of importance. There is no treaty with Spain of this char-acter. Spain, the only country from which we import sugar into our Atlantic and Pacific ports of any consequence, has always refused to make a commercial treaty with the United States. We have no extradition treaty with her. We have no postal treaty with her. We have only the original treaty made at the conclusion of the last century and one or two small additional treaties of limited consequence. In none of these are there any provisions such as is referred to here, and there is no nation producing sngar imported into the Atlantic ports that has any treaty with the United States of the character that would entitle them to claim on the principles of this treaty the admission of their sugar into the ports of the United States free of duty.

of the United States free of duty.

We have treaties with various nations lying on the Pacific Ocean which do contain this provision of like favors. These are New Granada, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Nicaragua, and San Salvador. These are the only countries lying upon the American Pacific coast that produce sugar; and it is also the fact that they do send their sugar, the product of their own country, to the American Pacific ports. To show the extent of our importation of sugar from all countries into San Francisco for the years 1874 and 1875, I annex the following from the Commercial Herald, of San Francisco, of January 13, 1876: from the Commercial Herald, of San Francisco, of January 13, 1876:

By this table it will be seen that nearly all the sugar imported into San of these countries have we treaties which contain this "like articles" provision. Manila is a part of the Philippine Islands, belonging to Spain. Batavia is Dutch, belonging to Holland, and Honolulu is of the Hawaiian group, with which we propose to make this treaty. Therefore the interference with existing treaties is a chimera so far as it can ever become a question of difference. It can never have any existence as a practical question, whether considered in its application to either ocean side of the United States.

Sir. I have said that we have no treaty with either of the great.

Sir, I have said that we have no treaty with either of the great sugar-producing countries of the world that contains any trouble-some provision in conflict with our right to make this treaty.

But, sir, let us come to the treaties themselves. Take the case of

Costa Rica, (and I quote from that treaty because it is a very important and significant fact that the treaties we have made that contain this "like articles" stipulation are included in those of Costa Rica, San Salvador, Guatemala, and Nicaragua; while the phraseology is slightly changed, they all contain the same clause.)

Under this treaty we propose to grant favors for an equivalent in return for like favors received. This fact brings us clearly within the right to do as we please in treaties with other countries. I will read on page 198 of the same volume two articles of the treaty made with Costa Rica. I quote from this because it is the same substantially in all the others:

ARTICLE IV. No higher nor other duties shall be imposed on the importations into the territories of the United States of any article being the growth, produce, or manufacture of the republic of Costa Rica, and no higher or other duties shall be imposed upon the importations into the territories of the republic of Costa Rica of any articles being the growth, produce, or manufacture of the territories of the United States, than are or shall be payable on the like articles.

ARTICLE III.

It being the intention of the two high contracting parties to bind themselves by the preceding articles to treat each other on the footing of the most favored nation, it is hereby agreed between them that any favor, privilege, or immunity whatever in matters of commerce or navigation which either contracting party has actually granted or may hereafter grant to the subjects or citizens of any other State, shall be extended to subjects or citizens of the other high contracting party grantiously, if the concession in favor of that other nation shall have been gratuitous—

We are to grant them the same favor, provided the favor we have granted to other nations was a gratuity. That is not so in this case or, in return for a compensation as nearly as possible of proportionate value and effect, to be adjusted by mutual agreement, if the concession shall have been conditional.

Since that treaty was made in 1851 we have made other treaties incorporating like provisions. No statesman, no member of the Senate, no one in the debate in executive session in the Senate in opposition no one in the debate in executive session in the Senate in opposition to this treaty, because it is met with opposition more on sectional and imaginary grounds than on grounds based on a high and lofty appreciation of statesmanship—no one has before conceived the idea that we were making a treaty in this case in contravention of existing treaties.

I have read the provisions of the only treaties that possibly can come in conflict with this, and those provisions speak for themselves.

We have a right to make this treaty, and no nation in the world with whom we have an existing treaty has the right to take exception or make complaint.

I shall probably have an opportunity at the conclusion of this debate to go more into detail, and not only to reply to the objections already made, but to those hereafter to be made by the several gentlemen who shall oppose this bill. I hope then to be able to dissipate any illusions of theirs, or any delusions which their listeners may possibly be misled into ·be misled into.

This is not a new question; it is not now thrust upon the American people for the first time. It was a question thoroughly considered as far back as the time of Daniel Webster, whose statesmanship I am sure no gentleman on either side of this House is prepared to dispute at this time; a man of giant intellect, who approached every ques-tion from an altitude which lifted him far above ordinary debaters in the forensic efforts in which he took part; a great constitutional expounder, who, whatever may have been his errors of judgment, yet by the broad and comprehensive intellect which marked his public career throughout and by his patriotism has transmitted to posterity a fame on which we can afford to base any act of a purely broad and national character like that which affects this and other countries.

national character like that which affects this and other countries.

Long before California became an integral portion of the American Union, when we had not then, and, as it were, did not expect to have, any Pacific dominion, Mr. Webster saw with his eagle eye that the day would come when our Government and people would not be indifferent to the occupancy of these islands. When it was communicated to him as early as 1841, when he was Secretary of State under President Tyler, that the French had designs upon these islands, he declared most emphatically that they should not take possession of those islands if it took the whole power of this Government to prevent it were his advice listened to vent it, were his advice listened to.

After that time came the war with Mexico; after the war with Mexico California was acquired; after the acquisition of California came the discovery of its mines which have done so much to enable us to develop our great national resources. After that came the settlement of the Pacific slope by some of the ablest, most energetic, most progressive and talented portion of our people from this side of the Atlantic. It is within itself a magnificent national power, lying stretched along the Pacific coast, of our blood, religion, language, and nationality, having with us a common interest and a common destiny.

What has followed? They have opened up for us of the East a direct communication with China and Japan. We have commercialized Japan; we have stripped from the Japanese the bandage which for centuries has covered their eyes. We have opened the ports of China and have driven away to some extent the commerce of the English. While upon the Atlantic our flag has almost disappeared, floating no more over large tonnage of American shipping, on the Pacific we have maintained our influence, and there compete with the maritime nations of the world. By the development and practical use of the capital raised from the mines on the Pacific coast we have prosecuted the trade with the Indies far in excess of what England holds to-day, although she has had a foothold there for one hundred and fifty years.

I will not stop here to belittle this question by saying that our brothers of the Pacific coast have rights and interests that we should respect. I will not belittle this subject by dwindling it down to a sectional matter which concerns them and not ourselves. Therefore, sectional matter when concerns them and not ourselves. Therefore, sir, this proposition is based upon the very highest principles of public good, upon a general diffusion of the commerce of the East; so that the agriculturists, the manufacturers, the tradesmen, and mechanics of the whole country are to derive their fair share of advantage.

Mr. Chairman, among other authorities which I wish to quote in support of this measure, I desire to refer very briefly to the writings of Mr. Charles Nordhoff, a gentleman well known to the literature and the journalism of this country, who spent a long time upon those islands and made himself familiar with that people, their resources, and everything appertaining to the whole question. On page 97 of his work on Northern California, Oregon, and the Sandwich Islands, be says: he says:

Justice, kindly feeling, and a due regard for our future interests in the Pacific Ocean ought to induce us to establish at once a reciprocity treaty with the Hawaiian government. We should lose but little revenue, and we should make good that loss by the greater market which would be opened for our own products in the islands. Such a treaty would bring more capital to the islands, increase their prosperity, and at the same time bind them still more closely and permanently to us. It would pave the way for annexation, if that should ever become advisable.

I hold in my hand a letter from General Schofield, in which he urges with much warmth and ability the ratification of this treaty and also a letter from Admiral Porter, one of the most intelligent and distinguished officers of the American Navy. I ask the Clerk to read these letters.

The Clerk read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION OF THE PACIFIC, San Francisco, California, December 30, 1875.

Dear Sie: Knowing your interest in the subject, I venture to give you briefly my views in respect to the Hawaiian treaty which is soon to come before Congress for legislative action.

The Hawaiian Islands constitute the only natural outpost to the defenses of our Pacific coast. In the possession of a foreign naval power in time of war, as a depot from which to fit out hostile expeditions against this coast and our commerce on the Pacific Ocean, they would afford the means of incalculable injury to the United States

States.

If the absolute neutrality of the islands could always be insured, that would suffice. But they have not and never can have the power to maintain their own neutrality; and now their necessities force them to seek alliance with some nation which can relieve their embarrassment.

The British Empire, through its North Pacific and South Sea colonies, stands ready to enter into such an alliance, and thus to complete its chain of naval stations from Australia to British Columbia. We cannot refuse the islands the little aid they so sorely need, and at the same time deny their right to seek it elsewhere. The time has come when we must secure forever the desired control over those islands or let it pass into other hards.

The financial interest to the United States involved in this treaty is very small, and if it were much greater it would still be insignificant when compared to the importance of such a military and naval station to the national security and welfare.

I am, dear sir, yours very truly.

I am, dear sir, yours very truly,

J. M. SCHOFIELD.

Hon. J. K. LUTTRELL, M. C., Washington, D. C.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 23, 1876.

SIR: As the question for securing a treaty with the Hawaiian Islands is now before your committee, I beg leave to send you some points which were embodied in a communication I had the honor to lay before the Senate at their last session which I think will interest you.

a communication I had the honor to lay before the Senate at their last session which I think will interest you.

The Hawaiian Islands occupy a position in the Pacific Ocean corresponding with that of the Bermudas in the Atlantic, and the latter afford the British a principal outpost on our coast whence they could launch forth their ships of war upon us with perfect impunity.

The British government, fully aware of the importance of the Hawaiian Islands, have long had their eyes upon them, and but for American influence Hawaii would now be a second Bermuda.

Owing to the amount of iron that modern British war vessels have to carry, they cannot keep the sea for any length of time, but must have depots like Bermuda. For this reason, if for no other, the British government will do all they can to obtain a foot-hold in the Hawaiian and other groups of islands in the Pacific.

In answer to this, it may be said that the British can have their depots in Vancouver's Island or elsewhere on the northwest coast of British America, but they could not hold any place we could reach by land; and as Great Britain is the naval power of the world, these island stations are absolutely necessary to her. The Fiji Islands lay unoccupied for years until the British navy became all iron-clad; now they are wanted and taken as a depot.

You will see by the chart that a line drawn from the lately-acquired Fiji Islands to the British possessions on the northwest coast of America passes through the Hawaiian Islands, and the taking possession of the Fijis is but the preparatory step to the occupation of Hawaii. It is necessary to complete the chain of naval stations which is in the future to dominate over our commerce in the Pacific.

England is gradually driving us from that as she is from every other ocean, and she will endeavor to prevent our having any influence in that quarter or any depots for our naval vessels. If she succeeds in this, it will practically close the Pacific against American commerce.

Germany is fast taking rank as a n only to England and France. She is trying to get possession of an island in the West Indies and others in the Pacific for the same reason as England, namely, the extension of her commerce.

The position of the Hawaiian Islands with regard to our Pacific coast renders them of great importance to us in case of war. In such an event, if not too late, it would be necessary for us to occupy them; and therefore we should not permit any other nation to gain a footing in that quarter since it would render our future occupancy almost impossible.

The present condition of the Hawaiian Islands indicates that they must shortly seek intimate relations with some foreign power, if they do not with us, and every consideration points to the absolute necessity of obtaining for the United States a paramount influence there.

No foreign power should be allowed to hold a position on any of these islands, as a foreign naval station on one would necessitate a great expense on the part of our Government to keep up an equal force. If England, for example, establishes her self on our coast it is not for our benefit, but for her own interest and for our injury. She is now in possession of many of the best points in the Pacific and is shutting us out everywhere.

European commerce, customs, enterprise, and ideas of government are making shutting us out everywhere.

European commerce, customs, enterprise, and ideas of government are making rapid strides all over that vast ocean, a theater on which nature seems to have intended the United States should exercise the principal control.

In conclusion I will say that the loss of the Hawaiian Islands to us by passing out of the hands of the present owners would be a severe blow in a naval point of view, for in the event of a war we should be driven from the Pacific.

In fifteen years from this time there will be such a preponderance of the foreign element in the population of the islands, that they will naturally fall into the hands of some other power, unless we put a clause in the treaty to prevent it. Such a clause, it seems to me, can only be secured by granting reciprocal commercial favors.

Vors.

I never thought Senator Sumner an enthusiast on this subject, but we had several long talks together about this very matter and he was a strong advocate for annexation.

I have the honor to be yours, very respectfully,

DAVID D. PORTER,

Admiral.

Hon. FERNANDO WOOD, M. C.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The progress which the United States has made in the Pacific Ocean has naturally attracted the attention and jealousy of other countries. Our success in the prosecution of the trade with China, by which we have established an unbroken steam connection between our Atlantic seaboard and Asia, has not been unobserved by European nations, and especially England. France is also not unmindful of her own interests in this connection. She has possession of Tahiti, the Marquesas, and New Caledonia, while Great Britain rules over Australia, New Zealand, the Fijis, and New Guinea, and is now seeking to possess herself also of the Navigator's group.

The Hawaiian archipelago is really the only remaining portion of all the Polynesia Islands. No one familiar with this question can doubt the great importance to England of forming the connection between Hawaii and her South Pacific islands.

A scheme has been already set on foot to accomplish this purpose. The chief officials of New Zealand, prompted by British intrigue, have proposed to have them confederated with the groups of the South Pacific, already under British rule.

The dependent condition of the Hawaiian Islands and the gradual depletion of the native population compel them to seek some powerful succor and co-operation. The large American element in the resident population exercises an influence against the British design, and has succeeded in directing that government to enter into more intimate commercial and political negotiations with the United States.

Hence the origin of this treaty.

An effort is now made to effect an arrangement with the United States if possible before listening to British proposals. If we shall from any consideration of either mistaket policy or neglect of a self-evident advantage omit to avail ourselves of the profered advantage by the omission of the execution of this treaty, we shall discover too late that we have lost that which can never be recovered.

It will thus be seen that there is one foreign power which is watching with interest and solicitude for results of this negotiation. It is that one which has encircled the globe in the promotion of its policy for the extension of its commerce and the enlargement of its power. It is that which has never omitted an opportunity to further its schemes of ambition, wealth, or greatness; whose presumption is restrained only by its resources, and whose resources are almost illimitable.

Already she has planted a cordon around the American Continent. Her possessions beginning at the far north on the North Atlantic and stretching in almost entire line from the Arctic circle to Labrador, Newfoundland, the Canadas; thence to the Bermudas, the Bahamas, the West Indies; Honduras in Central America; the Falkland Islands at the extreme South Atlantic. And thence to the South Pacific in her vast Oceanica possessions, comprising Australia, New Zealand, and the recently-acquired Fiji Islands; thence stretching northward to British Columbia, which again by its extent and physical position crosses the continent and gives her a commanding position from ocean to ocean thus encircling North and South America, endangering our power and insulting our pride.

Need I add that it is British? It is this marvelous country which, with an original territory smaller than several of the thirty-six States of the American Union, can now boast that the sun cannot set upon the whole of her dominions. In every clime, in both hemispheres, on every continent, in all the oceans of the world, her flag flies honored and protected on English soil. Nor has this been accomplished by the results of an aggressive warlike policy. No, it was the result of a far-reaching design, having for its object the promotion of national grandeur and extension of commercial power. Diplomacy looking to the extension of her trade obtained and advantage than the aggressive design. the extension of her trade obtained more advantage than the sword

It is a singular fact that with all her vast American possessions not a foot of it has been acquired by conquest. Treaty, trade, intrigue, discovery, and the varied arts and accomplishments of diplomacy have done it all. And this may be also said with reference to her vast East India empire. Whatever bloodshed may have followed her rule there in order to maintain her power, originally she obtained her foot-hold under peaceful auspices. The same may be said of her European acquisitions as recently illustrated in her purchase of the Suez Canal. To those who affect to treat lightly the importance of these politi-

To those who affect to treat lightly the importance of these political considerations which underlie this treaty, let me say that there are many historical examples where nations have expended millions of treasure and exhausted thousands of lives to obtain or to hold positions of far less magnitude or value. I could refer to many. It is not necessary in this case. We are not asked to expend money nor to hazard life. No proposition is submitted to purchase nor*to acquire an addition to American soil, as in the case of Louisiana, California, or Alaska; no assertion of a right backed by power is required. We are called upon to do nothing inconsistent with our time-honored practice of establishing friendly relations through the operation of a practice of establishing friendly relations through the operation of a commercial treaty based upon principles of reciprocity. The boon is offered, and we accept it—accept it upon terms and conditions more than equal in our own favor, and alike honorable to both parties to the compact. We shall obtain a foothold upon foreign soil without the cost and responsibility of maintaining it, and keep off all others who may seek a like advantage.

The conception of this thought is of the highest order of statesman-

The conception of this thought is of the mignest order of statesman-ship. It emanates from a broad, comprehensive view of the nation's wants, and reaches that higher politics which soars above and beyond the domain of the present, looking to the future of this great people whose commercial ambition and material progress are alike almost

The Hawaiian Islands lie nearly midway in the middle Pacific Ocean between America and Asia. They are in the straight line almost due north from the British possessions in the South Pacific and the British possessions in the North Pacific. They are the coaling station and entrepôt of the American trade with China, and will lie nearer to the probable terminus of a southern transatlantic railroad than to the present Atlantic-Pacific railroad. As a military strategic point they would be indispensable in time of war; and as an auxiliary to our commerce with China and Japan they are almost indispensable. In the hands of an enemy they could be used as a means of annoyance and injury to our navigation and adjoining coast, and constitute a and injury to our navigation and adjoining coast, and constitute a constant menace embarrassing us at every turn.

Is it not the duty of this generation to do something by which to provide for the wants of the next and coming generations? Should we do nothing toward laying the foundation for that empire which shall in the not far distant future outrival in wealth and extent of territory the population and commerce of all others? With a productive power greatly in excess of our power of consumption, the day will come when we must secure foreign outlets and markets by which to dispose of the surplus; and where can we look with so much hope as to the people of the far west on the other side of the Pacific Ocean? In that direction our eyes are already cast for an opening of advantageous trade which shall more than compensate us for the cost and trouble which it may incur to obtain.

In conclusion, I ask the passage of this bill upon grounds of public good considered in its highest and most patriotic sense. Let no sectional interests, fancied legal or constitutional objection, or imaginary temporary loss of revenue deter members from supporting it. It is entitled to favorable action, and I cannot believe that such will not be the result.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration practically extends our protective tariff to the Hawaiian Islands, and gives to a few sugar-planters there an immediate annual bounty about equal in amount to our whole export trade to these islands, and ultimately not less than their annual export trade with all countries.

This is called reciprocity. And though it is asserted that such a treaty has been sanctioned by some of the first statesmen of the country, still it is a fact that until now no Congress has ever been reckless enough to give it legislative approval, and I trust this will

It was proposed in 1867-'68, when it was examined at the Treasury under the direction of Secretary McCulloch and in the Senate. The result of all the investigation was so decidedly in opposition, it was abandoned. Senators Fessenden and Grimes were earnest and outspoken in their opposition, both going to the extent of stating that the very idea of coupling the term reciprocity with the treaty was a fraud and an imposition.

With whom is it proposed to enter into a reciprocity treaty? With a group of islands two thousand miles distant from our nearest port, containing a population of 56,000, (less than many agricultural counties in the United States,) and rapidly decreasing. Of this 51,000 are natives, all so little inclined to labor that, though there is comparatively little business on the islands, Chinese labor has to be imported. tively little business on the islands, Chinese labor has to be imported. The climate of the islands discourages work; little clothing is needed, no substantial houses, and little food beyond the peculiar agricultural products of the islands. Wages of natives when employed, $8 per month with and $11 without food. Of the whole population only 4,772 are returned as plantation laborers, and of these about one-third are Chinese. The only product of the islands of any importance is sugar; but in the cultivation of this the natives are so little intersugar; but in the cultivation of this the natives are so little interested that it is said no sugar plantation is owned or worked, as proprietor, by any native. Trade therefore with the islands does not increase and, as the quantity of arable land is very limited, from natural causes, cannot increase. This is shown remarkably by the fact that the total exports of the domestic products of the United States to the islands in 1860, under a low tariff and a low range of prices for what we had to sell amounted to only $637.453 and while in 1874. what we had to sell, amounted to only $637,453 gold, while in 1874, fifteen years after, it was only $623,280 currency. During the same time there has been no material increase in the import of the products of other countries. In short, the whole product of the United States which the population of the Sandwich Islands have, on an average, been able to consume during the last fifteen years is less than the total value of the annual farm product of the war-ravaged county of Fairfax, value of the annual farm product of the war-ravaged county of Fairfax, Virginia; the country opposite the Capitol. And the entire value of products of all countries imported into the islands for 1873 ($1,155,422) was only about one-fourth the value of the farm product of a single county (Adams,) in Illinois, ($4,654,000,) and with about the same population, (56,362.) A treaty from a commercial point of view by the United States with the Sandwich Islands is not so important as a treaty with any good, thriving agricultural county in almost any State would be, provided the county was located beyond the territory of the United States.

Who, then, on the islands wants the treaty? The sugar interest.

The sugar-cane is indigenous to the islands, and yields more sugar to The sugar-cane is indigenous to the islands, and yields more sugar to the acre than in any other country, 5,000 pounds, or two and a half tons, being an ordinary product, rising often to 8,000 pounds, and in some instances to 12,000 pounds. The average yield in Louisiana is from 500 to 2,000 pounds per acre. The foreign population of the islands is about 5,000, (one-third Chinese,) but of this number less than forty own and work the sugar estates. Practically the treaty is to be made for the benefit of these forty people.

That sugar production has been profitable under more favorable conditions than exist elsewhere on the face of the globe is proved by the fact that the annual increase of the island product has been very great 1 444 271 pounds exported in 1860 and about 28,000,000 pounds great, 1,444,271 pounds exported in 1860 and about 28,000,000 pounds in 1875. Mr. Nordhoff says, page 60, in his book on the Sandwich Islands: "There are few legitimate branches of business in the world Islands: "There are few legitimate branches of business in the world that could be managed as slovenly as sugar-making in the islands and show such profits," and "that sugar-planting can be carried on in the islands at a fair and satisfactory profit whenever skill and personal attention are given and due economy enforced." But, of course, as everywhere else, there is a desire on the part of those sugar people to make more money and to make business poorly managed profitable. And this they propose to do by asking the United States to admit the sugar product of the islands free of duty into our market without being subject to our tayes. The duties imposed on the import of such ing subject to our taxes. The duties imposed on the import of such sugars as the Sandwich Islands are likely to send to the United States will be about two and a half cents per pound, which will be equivalent to a bounty of about 50 per cent. on the average market price at lent to a bounty of about 50 per cent. on the average market price at Honolulu. The import of sugar to the United States from these islands in 1875 was 8,944 tons, or, in round numbers, 17,888,000 pounds, on which, if the treaty had been in existence, a bounty would have accrued of about $400,000; while for this year the Secretary of the Treasury gives the import of sugar, without the treaty, at 24,850,438 pounds, which, were the treaty in force, would give the planters of these islands a bounty of $543,603, to be taken from our revenue.

Any business that guarantees 50 per cent. profit over and above a fair profit that now accrues independently, (for it is reasonable to suppose that the sugar product of the island would not increase year by year under existing circumstances unless it was profitable,) is certain to increase just as fast as it possibly can. We may look with certainty, therefore, from the conclusion of this treaty, that the islands will send us the first year after ratification every pound of sugar they can spare over their own requirements for consumption, sugar they can spare over their own requirements for consumption, and continue to do so, not sending a pound to any other country; that the sugar product will increase to the utmost extent possible; and that we shall have an import equal to their entire sugar export, not less than 30,000,000 pounds, in 1875, on which a bounty would accrue of two and one-half cents per pound, or $615,000. The area of arable land in the islands is limited. The Sandwich Islands commissioners think the product cannot be increased beyond 50,000,000 pounds per annum. Senator Booth states on authority of California experts that the product can be pushed to 135,000,000 pounds per annum. Mr. Nordhoff says there is room for about seventy-five to eighty more plantations on the scale now common, or about three times as many as now exist. It is therefore reasonable to assume that an import of at least 50,000,000 pounds, on which the United States would give a bounty and suffer a reduction of revenue from sugar to the extent of $1,200,000, may be anticipated.

Can we afford to buy trade with any country at any such rate? Can we not buy the markets of the world on such a basis? England, only a little farther distant from our Atlantic than these islands are only a little farther distant from our Atlantic than these islands are from our Pacific coast, would certainly sell us hers at such a cost. What would we have to sell after paying such a bounty? At present the total trade of the islands with all foreign countries is less than $1,400,000 ($1,155,000 in 1873) per annum. If we should get it all we should, on the basis of the Treasury estimate of this fiscal year of the sugar import, pay $543,603 for it. If the sugar product and export of the islands increase but the lowest rate that can be anticipated, we should pay to these few planters, who are not Sandwich Islanders, a dollar for the privilege of selling merchandise of the value of another dollar, or $1,200,000 on sugar alone for the privilege of selling and exporting to them $1,400,000 worth of goods. Any counting as to the value of the profits of this export trade will show that we shall pay about five dollars for one to be received. This is reciprocity mostly on one side, and financiering with a vengeance. Can the nation, overborne and weighed down with taxation, afford to make a free gift of its revenues to a few people who pay no taxes to sustain our Government?

What is it pretended that the islands can give us in return? Their trade. But it has been shown that it does not amount to anything, and never can, of importance. Not as much as the trade of one good county or fourth-rate city of the country. There is a long and imposing list of things mentioned in this treaty, which the Sandwich Islands will agree to take of us free of duty. Brick, for example; they took none in 1873; window-glass, fifteen boxes from the United States and one from somewhere else; machinery of all kinds, $14,000 worth, about the cost of one good steam-engine and boiler; iron and steel, $25.15 worth; paper, $700 worth; fancy goods and millinery, $4,458; agricultural implements, they took $5,562. They took more than $100,000 worth of clothing, about one-eleventh of their whole import; but clothing is not one of the things made free by the treaty. They took about $55,000 worth of liquors and spirits, one-twentieth of their whole imports: but liquor and spirits are not to be on the They took about $55,000 worth of liquors and spirits, one-twentieth of their whole imports; but liquor and spirits are not to be on the free list. And so also are not furniture, carriages, other than agricultural, glass, crockery, paints, &c.

The list of things to be admitted free is an imposing one, but an examination will show that it contains but little other than those things which the islands must take of us now because we can supply them cheaper than other nations; and a great many things like furs, rice, sugar, fruits, tallow, hides, oysters, fish, eggs, shrubs, trees, vegetables, &c., which the islands supply themselves with, or do not want or could not be sent from the United States by reason of natural causes.

The list of reciprocal goods bears the impress of humbug on its face.
Will the Clerk read what was said of this treaty by a New England
Senator when it was under consideration in the Senate?

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

The financial question raised by this treaty, in proportion to its magnitude, will be a tough and unprofitable one for the Treasury of the United States. Measured by the past, it will deprive us of $500,000 of revenue. Measured by the whole amount of sugars annually produced in the Sandwich Islands, and this must be the actual test, it would at once be nearly double this amount, to be further augmented year by year until the utmost sugar-producing capacity of the islands shall have been reached. This capacity is variously estimated and will reach from three to five times the amount of the present production, which is stated to be from three to five times the amountof the present production, which is stated to be from three to five times the amountof the present production, which is stated to be from three to five times the amountof the present production, which is stated to be from three to five times the amount of the present production, which is stated to be from the office to thirty million pounds of Sandwich Island sugars may ultimately take the place of an equal amount coming from other places that is now subject to the payment of duties, averaging, for the class which will be received, not less than $\frac{3}{2}$ cents per pound, and may soon involve an uncompensated loss to the Treasury of two, three, or four million dollars annually.

Our market for their sugars is the best they can possibly have, treaty or no treaty, charged with duty or not. The duty is a sheer loss to us and a sheer gain to the twenty-five owners of the sugar-plantations, whether they reside in Hawaii or elsewhere. It is an immense subsidy to these wholly private interests and far more obnexious than any subsidy which has heretofore found congressional advocates. However honestly intended by the parties to the negotiation, I feel constrained to denounce it as a job, the chief result of which will be to put noney into the purses of a few Hawaiian sugar-planters, who have captured a good enough King to march treaty.

When the rejected Hawaiian treaty of 1869 was before us, it was claimed as a merit that all of the owners but two of the twenty-five were foreigners and almost wholly Americans. There is no doubt they are so now.

Mr. MORRISON. The import of Sandwich Islands sugar is only about 1 per cent. of the consumption of the United States. It can never exceed 5 or 6 per cent. of our consumption; besides, this being an article of such general consumption, the price will not be reduced. Sandwich Islands producers will therefore always take the very highest prices in our market, and the American consumer can never be beneto him. Yet the Government loses the revenue.

To increase the product of sugar on the island it is admitted there must be more labor. (Nordhoff, page 59.) The only labor available is cooly or imported Chinese labor, which is little other than a form of slavery. Do we propose to tax ourselves to encourage this importation of Chinese into the islands and strengthen this kind of servile labor ?

It is said that giving reciprocity will favor our annexation of the islands. Can any supposition be more absurd? Free trade, with all the world for all they want to buy, and a market for all they want to sell guaranteed to them by the United States under conditions that afford exceptional and enormous profits, the last thing under such circumstances which the islanders would desire would be annexative that the state of the state o ation and the deprivation of all their advantages.

Do we want these islands? What for? For war, for military or naval purposes? When are we going to stop spending money to prepare for war when we never can have war unless we choose to inaugurate it? If we take these islands we must have a navy-yard, coal-depot, a fort, a regiment of infantry costing over a million a year, territorial governors and officials all salaried, Delegates in Congress, all to be paid by the overtaxed people of the United States. Th question of the hour is how to make living and production cheaper how to reduce taxes, not how to increase taxes, and multiply officials.

We are advised from official sources that the revenues under exist-ing laws fall short of the requirements of the public debt and other needs of the Government. From what source is the money to be deneeds of the Government. From what source is the money to be derived which by this treaty is given away to Hawaiians? Who is to pay it? Will the gentlemen who favor this treaty tell us? Its chief supporters oppose any modification of tariff exactions and oppressions by which we may lessen the burdens and add to the revenues of the people. It is not therefore to be made up from that source. Is it to be levied upon tobacco, the product of the South, or spirits, the product of western corn? Certainly the friends of this measure will not tell us it is to be made up by reductions in needless expenditures. These have failed to secure their support lest, as they say, the honor of the country, and especially its commercial interests, might be prejudiced. Lest this should be done, we are told "we should allow our ministers abroad enough for them to be respectable, respectable in the European acceptance of the term, respectable by their exterior presenta-pean acceptance of the term, respectable by their exterior presentation at court," and that our carrying trade and ocean commerce will go down before the sun on the day when a consul at Bangkok or Winnipeg ceases to draw a salary from the public Treasury.

Sir, to have a carrying trade we must have something to carry.
We must produce something which can be sold at a profit, or it will not be carried. Nor can we buy a commerce in Hawaii or elsewhere abroad. It must grow with and out of prosperous and profitable labor and production. To do this the burdens of taxation upon labor and production must be lessened, not increased. This measure does will increase them.

There is no protection in this treaty, for there are no American in-terests to be protected. There is no free trade in it, for there is but little trade of any kind, and that is to be made exclusive for one side. There is no reciprocity in it, for much is given and nothing received.

Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. Mills.]

Mr. Mills. Mr. Chairman, in the few moments that have been granted to me by the courtesy of my friend from Illinois [Mr. Mornison] I desire to present to the committee some of the objections which I have to this bill. The first objection is that it is a gift of which I have to this bill. The first objection is that it is a gift of four or five hundred thousand dollars to the sugar-producers of the Hawaiian Islands. The annual imports into the United States from those islands amount to a little over $1,000,000. Of that amount the importation of sugar is about $950,000. Is there any benefit to be derived on ourside of this treaty for this bonus which we propose to grant to the foreign producer. I assume that it is capable of demonstration that it is a gift to the foreign producer, and no benefit to our citizens on the Pacific coast. Why? Because the price of sugar in the West will be regulated, not by the duty which you take off the Sandwich Islands sugar, but by the price of the sugar that is transported into that country from the Atlantic seaboard. The sugar brought into the United States amounts to about $85,000,000 a year, a consumption of about $2 a head among our people. There are about 1,000,000 of people on the Pacific seaboard. They consume about two million dollars' worth of sugar annually. They obtain about one-half of the sugar they consume from the Sandwich Islands. The other half they obtain after paying a duty in the cities of Galveston, New Orleans, New obtain after paying a duty in the cities of Galveston, New Orleans, New York, Boston, and other Atlantic seaports, and then transport it by rail to the Pacific coast. There is not a sufficient supply of the sugar coming from the Hawaiian Islands to satisfy the demand of that western country. Hence they have to buy at whatever price they can the sugar that comes from the eastern seaboard. When this sugar, brought from the East, after paying charges and duties and cost of transportation, comes to the consumer in California, Oregon, Nevada, and Utah, the consumer is obliged to pay the cost of the article with these charges added: the original cost of the product, the cost of water transportation, the cost of the duty, the cost of rail transportation. What is the result? Why, sir, the eastern sugar fixes infallibly the price of the Hawaiian sugar just as much as the Russian wheat fixes the price of your western wheat in the markets of Great Britain.

Then, sir, it is a gift; it is a bounty. And when you remove this bounty the people of California will pay twelve months from the day after you have passed this bill—for that it will pass I suppose there is no question—will pay the same price for their sugar from the Hawaiian Islands that they pay to-day.

Well, sir, are we not to replace in our Treasury the amount of money which a streat from it for the large of the grant of which we extract from it for the benefit of these people? Is the condition of our country such that we can afford to lose that revenue and not exact it from our people? Let the prostrated condition of our land answer that question. Let the bills that are now pending in your Committee of Ways and Means for increasing the revenue answer that question. Let the reductions in expenditures now being made, answer. More money has got to come into the Treasury to answer the need of the Government; and how are you going to get it? Are you going to tax the realized wealth of the land? Not a bit of it. you going to tax the realized wealth of the land? Not a bit of it. Do you propose to tax real estate? You cannot do it under the Constitution. What do you propose to tax? You propose to tax the laborers all over the country by placing duties on foreign imported goods, woolens and cottons, iron and steel, and all those other imports that enter into the consumption of our people day by day. Well, there is a twofold tax when you enter that field of taxation. I had a table furnished me by the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics some time since which I used in a former speech that I made on the tariff, and I will refer to a few of its figures to demonstrate the logic of this thing.

There were twelve given articles in that table, of which there were consumed in the United States one billion nine hundred million dollars' sumed in the United States one billion nine hundred million dollars' worth; $1,622,000,000 were domestic products, $210,000,000 were foreign products. Upon the foreign products we paid an average duty of 41.73 per cent., which realized to the coffers of the Government $87,000,000. But the consumer of the domestic product paid the same tax exactly for the protection of domestic manufactures, so that, in getting into the Treasury of the Government the sum of $87,000,000, the people of the United States paid for protection $676,000,000, or seven times as much to the domestic manufacturers as they paid for the support of the Government. Therefore, when you come to replace seven times as much to the domestic manufacturers as they paid for the support of the Government. Therefore, when you come to replace in the Treasury the $400,000 that you give to these producers of sugar in the Hawaiian Islands you take from the laboring poor man all over the country two and a half millions of dollars to sustain domestic manufacturers; and the entire tax you impose upon the people of the United States which falls on the laboring people of the country is about $3,000,000. That is what you give as a free-will offering for the benefit of these femigar sugary plants.

benefit of those foreign sugar-planters.

There is one other objection to this treaty, and it is this: that when you establish this treaty with the Hawaiian Islands, these products of theirs, their sugar and other products mentioned, shall come in free. Have you any guarantee that this will not be an open gateway for fraud? Why may not Cuba and why may not other countries producing sugar and other articles that are made to come in free from Hawaii, pass them through that gate into the United States and thus constantly defraud your revenues? What provision have you got to guard against that? None.

guard against that! None.

Ah, but we are told that this is a necessary measure of precaution against a war with Great Britain. Indeed! Now, who ever heard of against a war with Great Britain. Indeed: Now, who ever heard of a commercial treaty preventing a war with any power? Or who ever heard of a commercial treaty between a strong and a weak power giving to the stronger power any benefit in case of war with another strong power? Who ever heard of a people so weak that their power was despised laying between two belligerents of great strength, that ever were able to preserve their neutrality or cause a moment's pause in the march of either to consummate his purpose?

In the first place, I answer that England and the United States annot go to war. There are two reasons why they cannot. One is cannot go to war. that they are both commercial peoples; England almost exclusively commercial and the United States one of the first commercial powers of the earth. And commerce is king. England could not afford to fight the United States when she had her hands full with her own people. England dared not accept the gauntlet of battle that was thrown down to her even then when the United States was struggling with the valor of her own people, and trying to suppress her own people in arms against the national authority. It was a gigantic civil war, that brought into exercise all the power of the Government to succeed, but England even then dared not to enter the lists. you think that now, when we are re-united, one great people, having demonstrated that we possess more war power than all the other peoples of the earth, do you think England can afford to fight the United States and lose all her commerce on the ocean; do you think she can afford to lose her American possessions? Sir, the reverberation of the first gun that sounded the hostile conflict on the part of Great Britain against the Government of the United States would shake from the British crown her American dependencies as ruthlessly as the chill winds of autumn shake the dried leaves from the trees of the forest. The combined powers of earth could not interpose and save them. The day is past when the sovereign power of the United States can be challenged in equal combat on this continent. Whatever may be the divisions of her people; however high partisan feeling or sectional jealousies may rage, the moment a hostile foot of any foreign power plants itself upon her soil all domestic discord will sink down and subside, and the elements of her combined power will sink down and subside, and the elements of her combined power will be thrown across the path of the invader. And when such a war should end the dependencies of Great Britain on this continent would be seen as members of the family of American States.

But suppose such a calamity should occur; suppose war does come between England and the United States; do you think that England would make war on the Pacific coast instead of on the Atlantic? Has she ever been guilty of such stupidity as that in the prosecution of war? Sir, the thunder of her cannon would not be heard on the Pacific but at the doors of your cities on the Atlantic. She would fight cific, but at the doors of your cities on the Atlantic. She would fight where she could do most harm to you and most good to herself; she would point her cannon where their shots would inflict the heaviest What would she make by doubling Cape Horn and going around by the South American states, far away from her bases of supply, and making war on the United States on the sparsely-settled coast of California, Oregon, and Washington? But suppose she was even so blind as to do so, do you think she would want to take the Hawaiian Islands as a station to supply stores to her navy, when she has ready at your doors in British Columbia, at Vancouver's Island, right in contact with her own people, a naval station which is literally in our midst? Why should she go two thousand miles into the center of the Pacific Ocean to find a depot for her naval stores when she has got one right under your eyes? Sir, she would not do it.

Suppose that England does make war with the United States and that she passes by the Atlantic cities on our coast; that she goes around Cape Horn and by the South American states and comes into the Pacific Ocean. We will suppose that she has selected as the site against which she will hurl her thunderbolts the sparsely-settled States of the Pacific; we will suppose that she desires to form a naval depot at the Hawaiian Islands. Will a commercial treaty keep her from taking them? Will a treaty providing for free trade in sugar, rice, paddy, and pulu prevent her from doing it? I want gentlemen to tell me where there is a solitary instance in history where a defenseless little power situated between two large belligerent powers has ever been able to maintain its neutrality when the line of their march lay over her borders? Where is there an instance of it? Why, sir, if you had a treaty not only commercial but a treaty of neutrality, to which both parties had given their assent, it would still not hinder them a moment in the march of their armies to occupy it. I will cite to the House the case of the island of Malta. Malta had be-Name of the Knights of St. John ever since the Middle Ages. When Napoleon Bonaparte started for Egypt in his campaign of 1793, he found that the island of Malta would be a good strategical point at which to make a naval station and cripple Great Britain and prevent her from getting to her eastern possessions. What did he do? Did he respect the neutrality of Malta? Not for a moment. He seized the island, and Great Britain aided by the allies entered the lists against him, and at the termination of the war in 1805 the island of Malta was again by the treaty of Amiens restored to the gallant knights from whom it had been taken. But Great Britain saw the advantage to her of its occupation, just as Napoleon Bonaparte had done, and in turn seized it herself, and with the fall of Napoleon Bonaparte she was enabled to retain it, and I believe holds it to this The same is the fact in relation to all small powers scattered over Europe or wherever else you find them. They are absorbed by the stronger powers.

A few years ago you saw all over Europe little powers and principalities everywhere, but now they have all been gathered into the arms of England and Russia and the German confederation and France and Spain and Austria. Gentlemen will remember the duchy of Luxembourg lying between France and Prussia. It was well known in history to be the strongest point for strategical purposes on the continent of Europe—Gibraltar alone excepted. How long it was contended for with diplomacy and force by the Prussians and French. What intrigues were practiced to bring this little spot on the map under the shadow of their respective scepters. In 1867 France was secretly negotiating for its purchase; Prussia intervened and offered secretly negotiating for its purchase; Prussia intervened and offered the highest price and won the prize; France frowned, and threatened, and Prussia yielded. Luxembourg still existed a neutral. In the Franco-German war, the French occupied it and passed their troops through it. Bismarck complained and denounced the treaty of neutrality, beat the French, and dismantled the fortress. But as long as the fortress stood, it was a standing menace to both Prussia and France, and on the breaking out of war between them neither hesitated was decreased.

tated under any circumstances to occupy it if they could.

Let me cite one instance more with which you are all familiar. At the commencement of the unhappy war between the States, through which we have so recently passed, the State of Kentucky—which I am proud to call my mother—unwilling to stain her fair hands in the blood of her children and kindred, and anxious, painfully anxious, to interpose every element of power to prevent the fratricidal strife and to plead with all the power of filial affection for reconciliation and reaches the restriction of the balliers. and peace, declared her neutrality and forbade either of the belligerents from coming upon her soil with arms in hand; forbade each of the contending powers from entering upon her soil. How long was the contending powers from entering upon her soil. How long was that neutrality respected? Until the two contending powers got ready to engage in the deadly conflict; and then, spurning her neutrality because she did not have the power to assert and maintain it, they met upon her borders and mingled their blood upon her soil. And there she stands to-day, as she stood in 1861 and as she has always stood, with her great heart throbbing with filial devotion to the Constitution and the Union and holding in her warm bosom the mingled stitution and the Union and holding in her wall.

So back to a little history older than that. We all remember the history of Charles XII of Sweden when he contended with Peter the Great of Russia. Poland and Silesia lay in the line of his march toward the territories of Russia. The German Diet thundered its denunciations against him, declaring him a public enemy if he should dare to cross the Oder. Voltaire says that their edicts were as solemn than the content of t through it; he went on to Poland, and Poland, seeing the two mighty belligerents on each side of her and seeing that all attempts at force were vain, tried the arts of diplomacy; and while her senate was dis-cussing her painful and dangerous situation, under which one of the flags she should fly for shelter, the minions of power stepped upon her threshold and demanded, "Under which king, Bezonian? Speak or die." The victorious Swede swept through her territories, uncrowning one king and crowning another with the indifference that he would have moved a pawn upon a chess board. As he moved on to his objective point, finding his army without provisions, he de-flected from his way and entered without ceremony the Ukraine, then ruled by Prince Mazeppa, whose name the English poet has made immortal, and supplied his army.

So, Mr. Chairman, it is perfectly idle for us to talk about a commercial treaty with the Hawaiian Islands ever stopping the advance of the English when it becomes necessary for them to seize that point to deal a blow at her adversary. Self-preservation is the supreme law of nature both to individuals and nations, and no nation in war ever yet neglected or ever will neglect to seize a point of that kind, a strong strategic point, when the power that holds it is so contemptible that it cannot dispute its seizure.

Now, sir, in Europe they have a doctrine they call the "balance of power," which protects the several nationalities against the encroachment of those who surround them, or against the undue enlargement of the power of any one of them. They seek their protection in holding each other to the status quo. France cannot take a piece of Prussia ing each other to the status quo. France cannot take a piece of Prussia without Russia and England and Italy and Austria being consulted. Not the smallest little dukedom in Europe can fall until the mighty powers of Europe have had their say about whether it shall fall or not. And we on this side of the water have the same kind of political idea expressed by the "Monroe doctrine." It is the Monroe doctrine which will protect us against the possession by the English of the Hawaiian Islands, and not a commercial treaty. Why, do gentlamen think, if the United States were to become embroiled in war with England, France, Germany, and Russia, and the other naval powers of the world except Spain, and Spain were to make with them powers of the world, except Spain, and Spain were to make with them a commercial treaty of the most favored kind in reference to the island of Cuba-dogentlemen think that that commercial treaty would afford these belligerents the least advantage over the United States? She would seize the island under an executive order, if Congress were not in session, issued as soon as the declaration of war was made and before a hostile foot could be planted on her borders. All the commercial treaties that might be written between now and midsummer cial treaties that might be written between now and midsummer would not yield them the slightest advantage. The United States will never permit, whatever may be the treaties with Spain, the occupation of that island by any or all the powers of Europe combined. Whatever may be the rights of Spain to that island, the United States has a right to see that that island is not held and used to her injury, and that right she will at all times assert and is ever ready to maintain. It is not a commercial treaty, but the Monroe doctrine, the doctrine of our fathers, in which we find protection to our own possessions and the outlying islands around us. That doctrine is that no sessions and the outlying islands around us. That doctrine is that no European power shall interfere with or encroach upon the possessions of the United States.

We heard a few years ago the same note of alarm sounded in our ears in reference to San Domingo. It was discovered very suddenly that San Domingo was the great key to the Gulf. It commanded the entrance to the Gulf, and covered our Southern Atlantic coast. We were then in imminent peril of San Domingo falling into the hands of some European power that would use it as a naval station, from which they would provision and equip their hostile forces and hurl them upon our defenseless coast. The people of the United States were not easily alarmed and did not avail themselves of that great invaluable strategic point; and yet she rests as securely to-day with San Domingo where it is as if that island were a State in the American Union. No, sir; it is not the commercial treaty that renders us secure, but it is the well-known doctrine of our fathers, and held and cherished by their sons, that gives us security and peace; the doctrine that no foreign power can invade or encroach upon the posse sions of the United States or the islands that rest in the shadow of her extended wings.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the Committee of Ways and Means, in the discharge of its duty, was called upon to consider a bill referred to it providing for carrying into effect the provisions of a treaty negotiated between the United States and the Hawaiian government and ratified by the Senate of the United States and also by the Hawaiian government. In examining the subject, the committee found that similar treaties had been heretofore negotiated and their provisions considered by several Secretaries at the head of Departments of the Government. It was found that during the administration of President Pierce, in 1855, a treaty had been negotiated which, through the instrumentality and with the approval of the then Secretary of State, William L. Marcy, contained provisions far less advantageous to the Government of the United States than the treaty under consideration. They found that subsequently to that time another treaty had been considered, which was recommended by Secretary Seward and received the approval of different members of the Cabinet of President Johnson. Each of these treaties received the warm approval and indorsement of all the statesmen who had been concerned in negotiating or considering them on the part of the United States. This treaty came to us with a strong indorsement from the Senators who had considered it as well as from the mem-bers of the present Administration. We examined these provisions, and we found that additional articles were provided for in this treaty to be admitted into the Hawaiian Islands not provided in the other

We find in addition to this that a clause was incorporated in one of the articles of this treaty that seemed to secure to the United States special and unusual commercial privileges. After a full examination of the subject, a majority of the committee came to the conclusion to report favorably upon this bill and to recommend to the House its passage. The reasons and arguments therefor have been presented in the report of the majority of the committee and have been fully presented by my colleague on the committee, [Mr. Wood, of New York,] who has this bill in charge. It seems to me, therefore, unnecessary that I should now stop and recapitulate those arguments or to restate them,

I will therefore briefly allude to some of the advantages secured to our nation by the treaty and reply to some objections that have been made by gentlemen to the passage of this bill. In the first place, the islands situated midway in the Pacific Ocean, on the route to the great continent lying to the westward of our Pacific States, invite us to closer commercial and political relations. The area of those islands is almost equal in extent to that of the State of Massachusetts, and larger than that of the States of Connecticut and Rhode Island combined. But a short time since they were inhabited by a nation sunk in barbarism, in the lowest state of superstition. That nation has now become a civilized and to some extent a Christian people. That group of islands, the largest in the North Pacific Ocean, is, if I may so term it, a half-way house between San Francisco and Australia, or between Japan and the Isthmus of Darien. Being, as it were, an outpost upon our commercial frontier, it is this consideration that has challenged the attention not only of the statesmen of America but the statesmen of the world.

This treaty was negotiated for the purpose of bringing us into more close and intimate relations with that people. It is objected that it gives more than we receive. It is true that this treaty, as does every treaty relinquishing the right to tax a portion of the commodities that are imported from a country, does reduce the revenue which otherwise would be collected upon the articles embraced in the treaty. I will not stop to discuss the question whether such a tax or duty is paid by the home consumer or the foreign producer. There are different schools of opinion upon that subject, and gentlemen of those schools entertain different views.

Now, those who claim that the foreign producer pays the tax imposed by duties on foreign commodities cannot complain that we do anything more than to relinquish to those people the tax which we heretofore have been imposing upon them, in consideration of their relinquishing to us of a portion of the tax they have heretofore imposed upon us. I will not, however, stop to discuss that point.

It has been said in public discussions, and perhaps in debate on this It has been said in public discussions, and perhaps in devate on this floor where my own name has been brought out in connection with views that I was charged with entertaining, that I hold that the domestic consumer himself pays the tax. In the first remarks I made upon the subject of taxes through tariff duties, on this floor some years ago, I announced, and I believe it is a truth that every one who has examined the subject must assent to, that sometimes the home consumer pays all the duty through the increased price of the commodities charged to the consumer cometimes the foreign producer pays it. the consumer, sometimes the foreign producer pays it through a reduction of the purchasing price abroad, but usually it is shared in a greater or less degree between them.

That is the case in regard to the relinquishment of this duty. The tax that is imposed by our tariff upon the articles that are to be admitted free under the provisions of this treaty is borne by the people of both countries. For instance, if we relinquish a portion of the tax imposed upon sugar, in that case it will doubtless at first inure to the imposed upon sugar, in that case it will doubtless at first inure to the benefit, in a large degree, of the people of the Hawaiian Islands; because the consumption of sugar on the Pacific coast, which sugar is supplied from the Sandwich Islands and from the East Indies, and not from the West Indies, is much more than the Sandwich Islands are capable of producing, being some two and a half times as much as those islands at present produce. The effect will probably be to increase the profitableness of the production of sugar in the Hawaiian Islands. That necessarily will act upon the price upon the Pacific coast, and a portion of this benefit, ultimately a large portion of it, must result to the people on the Pacific coast. I think that is the philosophy, the rationale of this release of duties.

must result to the people on the Facine coast. I think that is the philosophy, the rationale of this release of duties.

Right here it is said that this release of duties will inure to the benefit of a few sugar-planters only, the number of which is variously estimated by gentlemen. The chairman of the committee [Mr. Morrison] says there are but forty of them; that they will get the benefit of this release of duties. The gentleman [Mr. Kelley] who is to follow me will not argue that the benefit would be confined to them merely. If it is, then, when a duty is imposed upon cotton or upon iron, it will inure to the benefit of the cotton-manufacturers and the owners of ore beds and the manufacturers of iron. But it does not inure to their benefit wholly; it diffuses itself, and must do so in the

The release of this duty, while, perhaps, increasing the profitableness of the production of sugar in the islands, will diffuse itself among the whole people of the islands. The other day a gentleman referred to the low price of wages there. The effect of this will be to increase the price of wages, to make a greater demand for labor, to make labor more profitable. Therefore it will benefit the people of the Hawaiian Islands as well as the owners of the sugar plantations or the sugar-planters. It will increase the power of these laborers to consume the exports from the United States to the islands, and so increase our export trade. But supposing that these sugar-planters are to be benefited, I do not know that that would be an argument why we should not ratify this treaty if it presented to the United States advantages such as are claimed. It does not concern us whether all the Hawaiian people or a portion only are benefited. It is sufficient for us that it benefits our own nation.

It is said that the release of duty is unequal. It is true that the average of our tariff upon these products is higher than that imposed by the Hawaiian government. But there is no guarantee that their rate of duty will remain as at present. I believe that the necessities of their government would compel an increase of the rate of duty, and that, as the commerce of the Pacific increases and the attention of the people of the Pacific coast is diverted from mining industry (as it must be to some extent) to raising cereals and to the product of their farms, their fields, and their forests, the demand for those products for export to the Hawaiian Islands will be increased, and that ultimately our exports and our imports to and from that country would become our exports and our imports to and from that country would become equal. It is the tendency of trade everywhere to equalize itself.

I have said that those people are looking for closer political and commercial relations with other people. They look to us first; but if they fail here, it is probable they will look elsewhere. They will look either to England or to France. Let them make the same offer to France that they have made to the United States, and I believe it would be accepted. The French duty on sugar of the lowest grade is £17s. 11d. per hundred-weight, or about seven cents per pound. The French nation imports about two hundred and fifty million pounds of French nation imports about two hundred and fifty million pounds of colonial and foreign sugars in the raw state. It exports about an equal amount of refined sugar—about fifteen million or twenty million But it pays a bounty to the exporters of refined sugar; so that practically it receives no revenue from this source. It encour ages the importation of raw sugar and encourages its being refined and exported to foreign countries as refined sugar.

Now let the French nation offer, as it might, to the Sandwich Islands to allow the importation into France of raw sugar free of duty; and to allow the importation into France of raw sugar free of duty; and it would be the same advantage that they would get from the United States, excepting that the cost of transportation from the Sandwich Islands to France would probably be somewhat greater than to the Pacific coast. In that event they would get the same encouragement; and we should lose this trade, the importation of sugar from the Sandwich Islands, and much of the trade of these islands would be diverted from the United States to France.

It is said that we are involved in commercial treaties with other nations which will require us to reduce our duties upon similar articles imported from those other countries. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] has discussed that point. As I understand, he has examined all the treaties that we have with foreign nations, and he insists that there are no treaties which will require us to admit these sists that there are no treaties which will require us to admit these products free. I have examined a few of them, and have not been able to find one. For instance, there is the treaty with Costa Rica, which contains the provision that is objected to. But we do not import sugar from Costa Rica. Our importation of sugar is very slight from any of the countries with whom we have those commercial treaties. If gentlemen who are to follow me, and who object to this treaty, will point out some nations with which we have similar treaties. would thank them to inform the House what articles embraced in this treaty are imported from those countries, and the amount of the importations of such articles. I have not examined fully with reference to all these countries. I have only referred to one or two, but I have so far been unable to find any treaty of the nature alluded to in the minority report that could affect our revenue.

Mr. Chairman, is it not desirable to increase our commerce upon the Pacific coast. The competition for the carrying trade on the Atlantic between our sailors and shippers and those of foreign countries has been disadvantageous to us and disastrous to our commerce and shipping. As year by year passes away, we find our foreign shipping on the Atlantic relatively diminishing, while that of foreign nations is increasing. But on the Pacific we ought to defy the competition of the world. On the eastern shore of the ocean that washes the coasts of our Pacific States are nations numbering nearly forty million peo-

The forests of Oregon, Washington Territory, and Alaska, the skill and intelligence of our artisans and mechanics, must make eventually the Pacific States the ship-builders for the Pacific Ocean. There will yet be the seat of our commercial empire. In the future we must control the growing commerce of that ocean with China and Japan. control the growing commerce of that ocean with China and Japan. That commerce is increasing. Last year added 70 new vessels to its commerce. The Pacific States already register or enroll 225 steam and 884 sailing vessels, and number 1,225 vessels of all kinds upon that coast, with a tonnage of 229,257 tons. The very statement of the magnitude of that commerce, its territorial extent, stretching from the southern boundary of California to the northern boundary of Washington and along the coast of Alaska to the shores of the Celestial Empire, the prospective trade of the Pacific States with the nations of the Orient, although now in its infancy, but hereafter to cover the Pacific Ocean as that between Europe and America now cover the Pacific Ocean as that between Europe and America now covers the Atlantic, should induce us to avail ourselves of this opportunity to secure the commercial advantages that this treaty guaran-

Further, in case of war it would be exceedingly important, as was urged by the gentleman from New York, that the right to occupy any portion of these islands by foreign nations should be prohibited. I would prefer, Mr. Chairman, that there had been in this treaty adirect concession of a port, for instance the port on Pearl River; but I care not to discuss whether the treaty could not have contained other concessions. Practically, however, it will secure this advantage: Other foreign nations are excluded, and it will result in such close commercial relations that, if we ever want the islands to become a part of the United States, we can have them.

It has been urged that this treaty will prevent annexation. I do not know that we desire annexation. I do not see why the people of the Hawaiian Islands would if the treaty is ratified be interested to prevent, nor has it been shown that we would have anything to gain by annexation. It is a fact, as the various books of travel show, that the expenditures of the Hawaiian government are nearly or quite as large per capita, having only about fifty thousand people and their taxation as heavy as our own. It would therefore, if the treaty is adopted, be as much to their interest to become a portion of the United States in the future as it is now or will be if this treaty fails by the defeat of the pending bill.

Mr. Chairman, these are some of the reasons why it seems desirable to pass this bill and practically carry the reaty into effect. The opportunity may not again occur. If this treaty is not ratified, treaties will be made by the Hawaiian government with other nations quite as favorable for them as this, and we will find ourselves excluded from the islands and the political and commercial advantages this

Mr. WOOD, of New York. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield, I will move the committee rise.

Mr. KELLEY. I would rather proceed; I believe I am entitled to the floor. I was anxious other business should be done this morning the floor. I was anxious other business should be done this morning and very unwilling this discussion should be thrust upon the House, to the exclusion of the legitimate business of Monday, and I do not propose now to accommodate those gentlemen who on successive Mondays, at the dictation of a committee consisting, as I understand, largely of gentlemen who share none of the honors or responsibilities of this House, have set its regular business aside. What is determined by the majority of this House I bow to, but that which is dictated by those who are not members of this House, however respectable they may be I disregard and am happy to theyer.

they may be, I disregard and am happy to thwart.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. KELLEY. I protest against this interference. Mr. KELLEY. I protest against this interference. Now, sir, I proceed to the consideration of the question before the House.

Mr. ATKINS. What does the gentleman refer to !

Mr. ATKINS. What does the gentleman refer to f
Mr. KELLEY. No, sir, I do not yield.
Mr. ATKINS. That is a fancy sketch; nothing but a fancy sketch.
Mr. KELLEY. I am going to proceed to the discussion of that question which the democratic party in this House made the business of the day by setting aside for a second time, as in fifteen years
I had never seen it done once before, the regular order of business for Monday.

Mr. LUTTRELL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania should not make such charges. I protest against them.

Mr. KELLEY. I have said my say on that subject. My protest is of record.

I desire to say to my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. Wood, of New York,] that I approach the discussion of this question with as solemn a sense of duty as he did. I regard it as one of prime importance. It assumes, in my judgment, as clearly the aspect and form of a well-defined job as any matter which has been brought before the House during my membership. I infer that it is entitled to that ugly epithet, as well from the provisions of the treaty as from the fact that I find floating about this House in support of the bill ex-members of the House and ex-officers of the House, who have been much wronged in the past if they have not been in favor of every beliated would have commended itself to Colonel Mulberry Sellers be-much wronged in the past if they have not been in favor of every bill that would have commended itself to Colonel Mulberry Sellers because there were "millions in it." [Laughter.]

It is a reciprocity treaty! Why, sir, the very name reciprocity in connection with it reminds me of Thackeray's costermonger and his little wife. He was a giant, and she little more than a dwarf, a doll of a plaything for him; but she was a spit-fire. She would thump him with her tiny fist, and his brethren inquired why he did not resent it? "Why," said he, "It doesn't hurt I, and pleases she." [Laughter.] Reciprocity between 40,000,000 people and 40,000 people! Forty-odd millions, occupying such a country as never before was given by God to a people, extending from almost the northern boundary of fertile land down to the Gulf; a country whose inland seas are lashed into fury by the March and November gales, and over which the latter annually howl the requiem of gallant navies, and which extends southward to yonder summer sea, over whose surface summer breezes southward to yonder summer sea, over whose surface summer breezes ever play; a country sweeping from the rock-bound shores of New England to the wooded plains, the snow-crowned mountains of Oregon and Washington Territory, and from the savannas of the sunny South to the golden sands of Southern California; a country that has every available climate of the world, save the tropical, and all conditions of soils—that may grow prosperously within its limits whatever may be grown outside the tropics; a country whose population doubles in every twenty years, being augmented by the receipt of millions of the most cultured, most experienced, and most skillful men in every avocation of life from all other lands; a country whose commerce is overtaking—and I use the word commerce in this connection with exclusive reference to foreign trade—is overtaking by regular annual steps the commerce of the mistress of the seas, and whose flag is destined ere half a century shall pass to pale the glory of the meteor flag of England on every ocean and on every navigable stream in countries foreign to them and us. southward to yonder summer sea, over whose surface summer breezes countries foreign to them and us.

By the treaty the bill under consideration proposes to confirm, this progressive people, thus fortunately situated, are to enter into reciprocity with a community that in 1872 numbered 56,000 people, the sad remnants left by commerce and missionary labors of 400,000; and of those 56,000, 6,000 are foreigners.

Mr. HILL. The number of the natives is 49,000.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, and 2 per cent. of them are civilly dead, having been condemned to seclusion for life as lepers in the hill and ing been condemned to seclusion for life as lepers in the hill and ocean girt asylum for lepers on the island of Molokai. The American people are to enter upon reciprocal trade relations with this small remnant of a perishing race. I wish I could say as the costermonger did, "It don't hurt I and pleases she," and therefore it may go on. But it will hurt us. It will involve us in very grave and great responsibilities; for it is asserted now and is true, as it has been whenever the making of such a treaty has been attempted, that the treaty is but a preliminary step to the acquisition of these islands; and a greater calamity could not well heful us than that same acquisition. eater calamity could not well befall us than that same acquisition.

But, sir, before proceeding to consider details, I should say that in opposing the treaty I plant myself on the Constitution, and that while I ask members of the House to vindicate the Constitution, I more than ask, I implore them to defend the invaded prerogatives of the popular branch of the American Government. In earlier days no Senate could be found to confirm a treaty which proposed to regulate commerce with a foreign nation. They recognized the fact that that power was assigned to Congress and withheld from the executive government. Lawyers know how the law courts of England were often compelled to resist the grasping rapacity for jurisdiction of the admiralty, and the executive branch of our Government for more than the last and the executive branch of our Government for more than the last quarter of a century has been as grasping of power as the British admiralty was of jurisdiction in the early days of British law. Treaty after treaty invading the rights of the people and the prerogatives of the House have been signed and submitted to the Senate for ratification; but it is only recently that they have found a Senate willing to unite with them in such an infraction of the Constitution, and but once in our history a House weak enough to betray its own powers and to forego its own duties and rights.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] told us of two treaties that had been made. I challenged him to name them, and he prom-that had been made. I challenged him to name them, and he promised to do so. What gentleman in this House heard the name of either? Mr. Chairman, did you? Gentlemen who sat around him, did you? No! For no such treaties had been made. I then asked him whether they had been carried into effect; and again he declined to answer. He must have referred to two treaties with the Hawaiian Islands, which the Senate, having due regard to the Constitution and the prerogatives of this House, rejected. They never were made, because they were not ratified. Had they become treaties, we would all have known of them for during their existence they would have been part known of them, for during their existence they would have been part of the supreme law of the land; and I challenge the memory of all members to recall either one of them or to find it in the body of the

The only such treaty ever made was that with Canada, and upon the earliest day that notice could be given of our purpose to rescind it this House, I being then a member, gave that notice and brought the treaty to a termination at the end of twelve months.

Mr. WARD. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. KELLEY. For a question.

Mr. WARD. I think, Mr. Chairman, the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania will perhaps remember that I had the honor to have charge of the renewal of that treaty. I had the honor to open and close the debate, and the gentleman must recollect that there was a majority of the House in favor of the renewal of the treaty, based upon the true principles of reciprocity; but the question was post-majority of the House in favor of the renewal of the treaty, based upon the true principles of reciprocity; but the question was postponed to the next session by the vote of three gentlemen who were more vitally interested in the subject than I or my locality was.

Mr. KELLEY. I must resume the floor. The facts were, I believe, thus: That this House required the Administration to give notice of the termination of the treaty at the end of one year from a day fixed; and it did give notice, and the treaty terminated.

Mr. WARD. The gentleman will perhaps allow me—

Mr. KELLEY. I cannot pause in my argument to allow these details to be gone into.

tails to be gone into.

Mr. WARD. I will undertake to say that the statement of the tentleman is an evasion—

Mr. KELLEY. I decline to yield further.

Mr. WARD. You do not want to hear the truth; you are afraid

Mr. KELLEY. I have told you the truth and nothing but the truth.
Mr. WARD. You have concealed it.
Mr. KELLEY. I have told you that on the earliest day this House could vindicate its right it did, and that in accordance with the demand of this House the treaty terminated at the end of one year, and that is the truth in a nutshell.

Sir, an attempt to inflict such a treaty as this upon the country and invade the prerogatives of the House was made in 1844. It was sought to establish by treaty reciprocity between Prussia and the United States. I send to the Clerk's desk the report made by Senator Choate, of Massachusetts, and ask him to read the part I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Senate ought not to advise and consent to the ratification of the convention aforesaid.

In submitting this report the committee do not think it necessary to say anything on the general object sought to be accomplished by the convention, or on the details of the actual arrangement, nor to attempt to determine, by the weight and measure of the reciprocal concessions, which government, if either, has the best of the transaction. These subjects have not escaped their notice, but they propose to confine themselves to a vory brief exhibition of another and single ground upon which, without reference to the particular merits of the treaty, they advise against its rational continuous confinements.

action. These subjects have not escaped their notice, but they propose to confine themselves to a very brief exhibition of another and single ground upon which, without reference to the particular merits of the treaty, they advise against its ratification.

The committee, then, are not prepared to sanction so large an innovation upon ancient and uniform practice, in respect of the department of Government by which duties on imports shall be imposed. The convention which has been submitted to the Senate changes duties which have been laid by law. It changes them either exidered, and by its own vigor, or it engages the faith of the nation and the faith of the Legislature through which the nation acts, to make the change. In either aspect, it is the President and Senate who by the instrumentality of negotiation, preed, or materially vary regulations of commerce and laws of revenue which Congress had ordained. More than this: the executive department, by the same instrumentality of negotiation, places it beyond the power of Congress to exceed the stipulated mazimum of import duties for at least three years, whatever exigency may intervene to require it.

In the judgment of the committee, the Legislature is the department of Government by which commerce should be regulated and laws of revenue be passed. The Constitution in terms communicates the power to regulate commerce and to impose duties to that department. It communicates it in terms to no other. Without engaging at all in an examination of the extent, limits, and objects of the power to make treaties, the committee believe that the general rule of our system is, indigent of the participation, to Congress. They infer this from the language of the Constitution, from the nature and principles of our government, from the theory of republican liberty itself, from the unvaried practice evidencing the universal belief of all in all periods, and of ail parties and opinions. They think, too, that as a general rule the representatives of the country, communicating the

Mr. KELLEY. I ask gentlemen to observe that that treaty was rejected by the Senate exclusively on the ground that a treaty touchrejected by the Senate exclusively on the ground that a treaty touching the revenues of the Government was an infringement on the Constitution. That was, as I have said, in 1844. In 1845 the administration cooked up another reciprocity treaty called the Canadian Zolverein. Mr. Archer, of Virginia, who had long presided over the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House, had been translated to the Senate, and was at once made chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of that body. The treaty having been committed to that committee, Mr. Archer reported against it, and it never came out of the Senate: but unhappily for us the injunction of secrety was never the Senate; but unhappily for us the injunction of secreey was never removed as it was in the other case, and I cannot bring to the attention of the House the language of Mr. Archer, but his report killed that treaty for reciprocal trade.

Now I come to what I infer were the two treaties alluded to by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Wood.] They must have been those with the government of the Hawaiian Islands, and the Senate in each case, having due regard to the Constitution and the prerogatives of this House, rejected the treaty when submitted to it for ratification.

Before leaving this branch of the question, let me say that I have been asked whether the House is not bound to confirm a treaty that been asked whether the House is not bound to confirm a treaty that has been signed by the contracting parties and approved by the Senate. The tenor of the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] was in that direction. I have only to say in reply to the suggestion that the terms of the treaty prevent its promulgation as a treaty until the Legislature of Hawaii, on the one hand, and the Congress of the United States, on the other, shall have given their formal approval; which God grant this House may never do.

Now, sir, with whom are we to enjoy reciprocity? Let us see. The Hawaiians number about fifty thousand. Their numbers, as I have said, are dwindling so rapidly, that at the time to which the gentleman from New York referred, when Mr. Webster spoke, there were one hundred thousand of them; and they are now, apart from seventy-eight hundred foreigners, but from forty-five to forty-eight thousand. We are to have the carrying trade. We have it already and no nation can take it from us, nor will any attempt to take it, for it is worth nothing. I will give you the figures of their trade in the last year of which we have returns, 1872. Their records inform us that there were 146 merchant-vessels and steamers entered at Hawaiian there were 146 merchant-vessels and steamers entered at Hawaiian ports, 91 of which were American, only 16 were English, 6 were German, 9 belonged to other nations, and 26 were Hawaiian. Of the 98,647 tons of shipping, 73,975 were American, 6,514 were Hawaiian, and but 7,741 were British. Of 47 whaling-vessels calling at the island ports during the year, 42 were American, 2 Hawaiian, and 3 British. Of less than 16,000,000 pounds of sugar exported during that year, 14,500,000 came to this country; of 39,000 pounds of coffee exported, we received 34,000, and of 1,349,503 pounds of rice and paddy, we received 1,317,203 pounds. In view of these figures, who will say that we are not in possession of their carrying trade?

The trade statistics are fully given here, but I will not detain the House by further reference to them.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] said the Hawaiians suffer for want of a home market. Yes, sir; they have no home market, and offer no foreign market beyond such as is indicated by the figures I have referred to. They can have no home market; they never can have a foreign trade. To develop a home market requires as a condition precedent the aggregation of population within circumscribed limits; and to do this requires as a further condition precedent, diversified resources and that diversification of industries which by rewarding the labors of each worker enables all to pay for and con-sume the productions of others. Between the producer and consumer the trader finds his place, and a general market grows up, creating towns and cities.

But to the people of the Hawaiian Islands these conditions are impossible. Nature made the edict against them, and seems to have made it for all time.

What are they? What is their country? These 50,000 people dwell upon eleven islands, divided necessarily into eleven communities—irregularly divided—and on every island they are again subdivided and kept apart by volcanic mountains and rugged and inhospitable plains of lava. Where, under these circumstances, is the pospitable plains of lava. Where, under these circumstances, is the possibility of developing a home market and a producing population with whom international exchanges can be made? At no point. Why, sir, twenty bags of potatoes overstocked the market of Honolulu, the chief town of the Hawaiian Islands. In making this assertion I speak by the record. I have here Mr. Nordhoff's book. He is as careful an observer and as competent a narrator as we often meet with; a thoroughly conscientious man, largely in sympathy with these kindhearted and poor people. On page 93 of his admirable little book, Northern California, Oregon, and the Sandwich Islands, he says:

Moreover there is but an inconsiderable local market. A farmer of Maui told me he had sent twenty bags of potatoes to Honolulu and so overstocked the market that he got back only the price of the bags.

Our trade with these people is to be reciprocal!

Eggs and all other perishable products, for the same reason, vary much in price, and are at times high-priced and hardly attainable. It will not do for the farmer to raise much for sale. The population is not only divided among different and distant islands, but it consists, for much the largest part, of people who live sufficiently well on taro, sweet-potatoes, fish, pork and beans—all articles which they raise for themselves, and which they get by labor and against disadvantages which few white farmers would encounter.

Now, gentlemen from Illinois and the wheat-growing States of the Northwest, what will you lose if you fail to gain this market for your wheat? Can you sustain such a loss and live? Says Mr. Nordhoff:

For instance the Puna coast of Hawaii is a district where for thirty miles there is so little fresh water to be found that travelers must bring their own supplies in bottles; and Dr. Coan told me that in former days the people, knowing that he could not drink the brackish stuff which satisfied them, used to collect fresh water for his use, when he made the missionary tour, from the drippings of dew in caves.

That is, for thirty miles upon one of the principal islands there is no fresh water to be obtained even for drinking. An admirable agricultural country, and one the farmers of which will doubtless require a great deal of agricultural machinery!

Take next the grazing lands. In many parts they are so poorly supplied with water that they cannot carry much stock. They also are often astonishingly broken up, for they frequently lie high up on the sides of the mountains, and in many parts they are rocky and lava-covered beyond belief.

Yet the people do raise cattle, and so great is the market for fresh and dried beef that they kill them for their hides and the tallow which they boil from them, the people eating scarcely any meat, as you will appreciate when you remember that the wages of a farm laborer are $8 a month with board and $11 without. So that $3 a month furnishes these industrious people with all their eggs, butter, cheese, beef, mutton, &c., which we are to have the right to send them in reciprocal trade. They do raise sheep, in spite of lava and the bur which is condestructive and they have on the whole sleave island. which is so destructive, and they have on the whole eleven islands about the number that would make a respectable flock in New Mexico or Southern Colorado, and the wool from these we now get, their garments being rather short, and in that tropical country not being reto get from them by virtue of this treaty:

Says Mr. Nordhoff.

One of the conspicuous trees of the Hawaiian forests is the kukui or candle-nut.

* * And from its abundance I supposed the candle-nut might be made an article of export; but the country is so rough that the gathering of the nuts is very laborious; and several persons who have experimented in expressing the oil from the nut have discovered that it did not pay cost.

Even at $8 a month and men boarded at $3 a month.

Only two thousand pounds of kukui nuts were exported in 1872.

Sandal-wood was once a chief article of export. It grows on the higher mountain slopes and is still collected, for 20,232 pounds were exported in 1872, and a small quantity is worked up in the islands. The cocoanut is not planted in sufficient quantities to make it an article of commerce; only nine hundred and fifty nuts were exported last year. Of pulu 421,227 pounds were shipped. This is a soft fuzz taken from the crown of a species of fern; it is used to stuff bedding.

And it would be well to remark this:

Also 32,661 pounds of "fungus," a kind of toad-stool which grows on decaying wood and is used in China as an article of food.

Now, how our regimen might be improved if we could get a part of this 32,161 pounds of fungus! Mr. Nordhoff adds:

There has been no lack of ingenuity, enterprise, or industry among the inhabitants. The government has imported several kinds of trees and plants, as the cinnamon, pepper, allspice, but they have not prospered. Private effort has not been wanting either. But nature does not respond. Sugar and rice are and must, it seems, continue to be the staples of the islands; and the culture of these products will in time be considerably increased.

MANAGER AND AND ADDRESS OF

"It may please she" if the House will pass this bill, but if gentle-tlemen will bring into view the fact that they who engineered this treaty, both on behalf of the government of the Hawaiian Islands and of this country, regard it as preliminary to our acquisition of the islands, or this country, regard it as preliminary to our acquisition of the islands, they will see that it will hurt us.

What by the terms of the treaty do they propose to send us? Let us in view of what we have just read examine the list. They propose to send us arrow-root, castor-oil, bananas. They shipped in 1872 4,520 bunches of bananas! "Nuts." We have read something about the nuts that they would send us. "Vegetables, dried and undried, preserved and unpreserved." Under this provision they will perhaps send us the remainder of those twenty bushels of potatoes, if they send us the remainder of those twenty bushels of potatoes, it they have not got to be too venerable to bear such distant transportation. "Hides and skins undressed." Yes, sir; doubtless they could send us as many as we already receive from them, but the number cannot be materially increased. "Rice." Yes, they can increase their production of that a little. "Pulu, seeds, plants, shrubs, and trees." Bear in mind what I have just read you from Nordhoff about all native and imported trees during or previous haveen.

in mind what I have just read you from Nordhoff about all native and imported trees dying or proving barren.

Well, is there nothing they can send us? O, yes, and this question brings us to the "job." This book tells us that, with the exception of three or four, the sugar-planters have been eaten up by interest and commissions; that their estates have bankrupted them all save the few who associated with foreigners, who gave them capital enough to enable them to escape exorbitant rates of interest and all-consuming commissions. Sir, "where the treasure is there the heart is also;" and I have learned to deplore the fact that American citizens can go just beyond our borders, invest their capital, and then penetrate these Halls asking us to extend our favorable legislation over their untaxed foreign investments. When New Englanders bought coal-fields in the British Provinces, we were besieged from year to year to admit coal free of duty or to make a reciprocity treaty. I never discussed the duty on coal in connection with or reference to the question of protection; for, consuming as we do nearly forty million never discussed the duty on coal in connection with or reference to the question of protection; for, consuming as we do nearly forty million tons a year of anthracite and bituminous coal the 500,000 tons that entered our ports from the British Provinces could not affect the price in the general market. But the duty put $500,000 into our Treasury; and it made the men who paid it (the foreign producer paid it for the privilege of entering our market and selling at whatever price coal ruled) anxious to get our flag and our laws over his country.

Now for the job. These abandoned or undeveloped sugar-plantations have been bought up by American capitalists; and it is they who ask us to give, under the guise of a reciprocity treaty, to their foreign tions have been bought up by American capitalists; and it is they who ask us to give, under the guise of a reciprocity treaty, to their foreign and untaxable investments whatever protection the duties on sugar give to the home producer. Would the amount they produce lessen the price of sugar in our markets? Why, sir, in comparison with the eighty million dollars' worth of sugar, molasses, melado, and sirup of sugar, (for they are all named in the schedule,) the relatively small amount those islands could produce would do nothing to reduce the price by overstocking the market; and the owners, being sagacious business-men, would sell at the market price. They would pocket the duty; and the general American market for sugar would regulate the price at which they would sell, as it does the Hawaiian sugar on which we now collect duty.

The object and intent, the pith and marrow of this bill is to vote into the pockets of those recreant American citizens the money that into the pockets of those recreant American citizens the money that we now collect and will from year to year collect on Hawaiian sugar, molasses, melado, and sirup of sugar. This is the whole story. They have nothing else to export to us. They and their Hawaiian or Mongolian laborers will want nothing that they do not already take from us. How much American energy, enterprise, and capital may develop the sugar-plains of those islands, I cannot tell; but if this bill passes, the duty on that amount, be it what it may, will have been granted as a subsidy to those American citizens who have invested capital in as a subside to those American who, in order to enable themselves to serve in the court of His Hawaiian Majesty, have denationalized themselves. Into their pockets, and theirs alone, will go the duties that should lessen the burdens of our overtaxed people.

But gentlemen say that we need these islands as an ontlying post of our country; that if we do not, some other nations will take them. Sir, do we need Ireland as an outlying post? Queenstown lies as near to Boston as Honolulu does to San Francisco; and if we require the one to protect our coast, let us seek both. While we are elevating the Hawaiian, let us emancipate the gallant Irishman, who has fought so many of our battles. If the argument of proximity be good in one case, it is as good in the other. Queenstown is but eight days from Boston, and Honolulu is eight days from San Francisco by our best steamers.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] compared these islands to Bermuda. Bermuda lies at our door; England governs it, and never disturbs us. She is under bonds to keep the peace with us. When England offers or accepts war with us, the Canadas and British Columbia will become ours. The "boys in blue" and "the boys in gray," rallying under the "Stars and Stripes," will intertwine and display to the people their old regimental flags tattered and torn in display to the people their old regimental mags tattered and torn in our domestic war. Yes, under the Stars and Stripes they will give the "rebel yell" and sing Union songs together in the same ranks as they overwhelm Canada and make the northern continent of America ours forever. [Applause.] The British government understands this as well as we do. Let us declare, as Mr. Webster proposed, that no nation shall take possession of those islands; that they lie there an outpost of the American continent; and we may rest assured that our peace or that of the Hawaiians will never be disturbed by foreign aggression. The way to protect our frontier is to develop our natural resources, secure to our laborers steady work at remunerative wages, and to bind the people together in fraternal bonds by increasing the friendly intercourse that will be promoted by every increase of interstate commerce.

Those islands had more commerce and offered more of a market in Those islands had more commerce and offered more of a market in 1840, the period referred to by the gentleman from New York, than now. They then had one hundred thousand population. Our commercial and whaling fleets were of sailing vessels, and they found Honolulu a convenient point for supplies. Petroleum had not been discovered, and the whaling-fleet was numerous. Steam has suppressed the Indian sailing-fleet; petroleum has given peace and safety to the whale in the northern seas; and I have told you the whole story of the shrunken trade and commerce of the Hawaiian Islands.

Let us treat the pecule of those islands kindly, as we have ever

Let us treat the people of those islands kindly, as we have ever done; let us maintain our missionary societies; send them books and teachers, give them assurance that no foreign nation shall by the arts of peace or war drive them from their desolate but beloved home. This, as a great nation, we can well do. But, sir, if we were to accept the islands as a gift, what would be our position? If war between Great Britain and us were possible, would the possession of these islands give us strength? No, sir; they would be our weak point. The British fleet of the North Pacific coast rendezvous in Esquimaux Bay, a little above the forty ninth parallel. The British fleet of the South Pacific rendezvous in the ports of Australia. Between these two and in a direct line lie the Hawaiian Islands; and if we can conceive England provoking war with the United States or willing to engage in it, why then you will want all your iron-clads, all your monitors, for coast-guard service, to protect those eleven islands, many of them quite remote from each other.

Gentlemen who now object to making appropriations for the improvement of our rivers and harbors tell me, will you, what shall be the annual appropriation for making a Gibraltar of each of these eleven islands? Why the prospect is fearful to contemplate, and they who press such considerations upon us fail to remember that, should England favor us with war any time in the next ten years, there would be, as I have said, such a rush of boys in blue and gray across their borders as would make future generations forget there had been any war between them, and the Union would be more endurably cemented and the Stars and Stripes more universally beloved by the American people than they have ever been.

Herein, I repeat, lies our true line of coast defense. Let us develop our own fields. Let us stimulate the growth of sugar in Florida, Louisiana, Southern Alabama, and Texas. Let us promote that most beneficent of all industries, the sugar-beet, in California, and our Northern Atlantic and interior States. I read recently, and brought to the attention of the gentleman from Georgia who does me the honor to listen to me, a statement that one sugarie at Sacramento had produced listen to me, a statement that one sugarie at Sacramento had produced 3,000,000 pounds of beet-sugar last year. There are others in that State. It is a great industry. It is, gentlemen—and you who represent agricultural districts let me impress it upon you that you again may impress it upon your people—it is the most beneficent of all agricultural industries. It was created by the great Bonaparte when hemmed in, the world in arms against him on land and sea, and his people were without sugar. Boundless in resource as he was, he said, "France will make sugar for herself." He summoned the ablest chemists at his command and submitted to them the question, "Can sugar be made from the beet; and, if so, how?" He got his reports. He offered 100,000 francs to the farmer who would grow the most beets on an acre, and 100,000 francs to the chemist who would extract the most saccharine matter from a ton of beets. He soon obtained sugar, which was all at which he aimed. He did not know that by that fact alone and its incidents he would be remembered through all time as France's greatest benefactor. benefactor.

Yet this is true. For what has been the result? France now exorts sugar to all the world. French refineries have uprooted all British refineries, consuming as they did British colonial sugar, and deputations of sugar-growers and sugar-refiners waited upon Michel Chevallier the day after he addressed the Cobden club in London, to remind him that the bonus France gives to her people upon the sugar they export was not in accordance with the theories of British free trade. "But, gentlemen," said Chevallier, "it is one of the means by which France is repaying to her people the taxes she imposed upon them at an early day in order to bring this great industry into existence. It stimulates production and reduces the price of sugar throughout France.

Herein beyond all this is its superior beneficence. Sir, it is found that in the preparation of the ground for the beet—deep plowing and rich manuring—the yield in the two succeeding years will be more wheat than the same land would have produced under ordinary culture in three years with annual plowing and fertilizing. So that it has added a new agricultural—

Mr. COX. Will the ground man allow me a moment?

Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. KELLEY. I am drawing to a close. My hour is nearly spent.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question? Has it not been demonstrated that it has cost France three times as much to raise beet-sugar as to have purchased her sugars abroad from tropical climes?

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman had permitted me to proceed, he would have found it otherwise. Sugar to-day can be sent from France into the United States and is sent by the hundred thousands of tons to England. Why, if colonial sugar can be made cheaper, can France undersell the British colonists and British refiners in every market of the British Islands? The gentleman's question is preposterous.

But, as I was about saying, it has added to the industries of the world a new agricultural industry. It gave us beet-sugar, while it increased the production of wheat; ay, and of hay and cattle. How so? why the leaves of the beet are cut, slightly salted, and buried for winter food for cattle. The refuse or pulp, three tons of it, is found in every country to be equal to two tons of the best hay that country can grow. So land otherwise required to prepare food for cattle grows can grow. So land otherwise required to prepare food for cattle grows beets, makes sugar, and feeds cattle; cattle which return a richer fertilizer than any given back to the farmer by hay-fed cattle. Let me prove this by a historic reference. Grant, in his admirable little volume, entitled Beet-Root Sugar, says:

In 1853, when the Emperor and Empress came to Valenciennes, a triumphal arch was erected, with the following inscription:

SUGAR MANUFACTURE.

Napoleon I, who created it.

Before the manufacture of beet-sugar the arondissement of Valenciennes pro-duced 695,750 bushels of wheat and fat-

Napoleon III, who protected it. Since the manufacture of beet-sugar was introduced the arrondissement of Valenciennes produces 1,157,750 bushels of wheat and fattens 11,500 oxen.

Here the hammer fell.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the committee do now rise.
Mr. BANNING. On Saturday last, while the Hawaiian treaty was under consideration, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WOODWORTH] made what I consider a very serious and unfair criticism on the Military Committee, and I ask leave at this time to answer it. I ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

There was no objection.

Mr. BANNING. I send to the desk to be read a statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WOODWORTH] in reference to this bill and the Military Committee

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Woodworth said:

Mr. Speaker, I seize the opportunity offered by the courtesy of the Committee of the Whole House, sitting to consider the Hawaiian treaty, to call up for discussion House bill No. 1462, granting bounties to the heirs of soldiers of the late war who enlisted for a less time than one year, and who were killed or died in consequence of the service. This bill was introduced by myself on the 24th day of January last, and was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, who, who this time, have taken no action whatever with regard to it. I have reason to apprehend that the partiality of the gentlemen who form that adjunct to this House is so great for my proposition that they have administered to it a soporific, and that it is now in some snug pigeon-hole of their committee-room sleeping the "sleep that knows not breaking."

Mr. BANNING. Mr. Chairman, that is a most unjust, unfair, and untruthful criticism of the Military Committee.

The gentleman says he introduced his bill on the 24th of January last, and had it referred to the Military Committee, "who up to this time have taken no action whatever with regard to it;" and that he has reason to apprehend that the bill "is now in some pigeon-hole of the committee-room sleeping the sleep that knows not breaking."

I find on reference to the record-book of the committee that the bill was referred to a subcommittee on February 1, six days after its introduction and two days after it was printed and came to the committee. There are before the committee thirty-one bills of a similar character, all of which, with the gentleman's bill, have been referred to the subcommittee. referred to the subcommittee.

The subcommittee consists of three members, two of whom have told me that they are ready to report the bill to the committee

These bills, Mr. Chairman, involve the expenditure of more than twenty millions of money. The gentleman's bill has been in the hands of the committee for a little more than four weeks. Since it came there he has never been before the committee to ask or learn the fate of it, to give any reasons or arguments for its passage, or to inquire if it had been considered. I have not found a single member of the committee of whom he has made any inquiry whatever regarding it, while some of the committee tell me they have not even the honor of his acquaintance; and but for the privileges of the Sat-urday's debate even his constituents might have forgotten that he was here. The records of the committee-room are open to his inspec-tion, where he might have learned the bill was being considered, and that a majority of the subcommittee had agreed to report favorably

In the face of all this the gentleman stated to this House in his speech that his bill had been put in a pigeon-hole of the committee-room to sleep the "sleep that knows not breaking." Now, Mr. Chair-man, while I am willing to be charitable regarding the misstatements of the gentleman as to the action of the committee on his bill, and believe that he has been asleep and is ignorant and not willful in his statements, I would like to know, sir, what reason the gentleman has to apprehend that his bill had been pigeon-holed by the committee. Had he asked me, I would have told him that the two members from this side of the House on the subcommittee were in favor of its provisions, had a report ready to make to the committee, and that I did not know of any opposition to it in the committee, and also that the members of the committee who were in the confederate army during the war are earnestly in favor of all its provisions. Sir, it is a singular coincidence that at the very time the gentleman was making this remarkable speech to a meager House, which had met to consider another measure, the Military Committee, of which he complains, were in special session investigating robberies charged to have been committed, not against the living, but against the dead soldiers of the late

Mr. Chairman, a bill containing all the provisions of the measure which it is now claimed a committee, the majority of which is comwhich it is now claimed a committee, the majority of which is composed of democrats, should consider and pass in four weeks, was considered in the last Congress for more than four months before its passage, and then defeated by a pocket veto by the President of the United States, who owes his name and fame to the soldiers whose rights he thus denied. Thus defeated, Mr. Chairman, at a time when the War Secretary of the President was fattening and growing rich off of the clippings made by the post-traders off of the private soldiers' pay.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to make further answer. I suppose, ir the gentleman's speech was made for distribution in his district.

sir, the gentleman's speech was made for distribution in his district. And, sir, I claim that it is due to the committee, that it is due to this House, that it is due to the gentleman himself, as also to his constituents, to whom he was evidently addressing his remarks, that he should correct the misstatements he made in this matter. He should say to the people of his district, and to the soldiers throughout the land, that so far from there having been any disposition on the part of the committee to stifle or prevent the consideration of his bill, the subcommittee to which it had been referred—two of the three being ex-confederate soldiers—had considered it favorably, and that a similar measure would have been the law of the land long since but for the action of a republican Senate and President Grant.

I think now, Mr. Chairman, and have always thought, that the man I think now, Mr. Chairman, and have always thought, that the man who attempts to make capital by stirring up prejudices engendered by the late unfortunate war will, in the end, be himself the loser. The Union soldiers are intelligent men; they know what is right, and know full well who are their true friends. And when gentlemen upon this floor whose broad backs and strong bodies never felt the weight of a knapsack or forty rounds during the war undertake to make capital by complaining of the treatment of Union soldiers by a democratic Congress, it would be well for them first to surrender their commissions as Congressmen to the men who haved their breasts to the storm of as Congressmen to the men who bared their breasts to the storm of as congressmen to the men who bartet their breasts to the storm of battle—who, since the war is over, indulge in no bitterness toward those against whom they lately fought, but recognize that we are all now citizens of a common country, laboring for a common welfare. Sir, before they indulge in complaints of this kind they should first expunge from the record the order of a republican administration that gave to Longstreet a better office than he ever held before the war and to Mosby the appointments to office and control of republican affairs in Virginia.

Sir, it is a noticeable fact that the men who now strive hardest to keep up the animosities of the late war were, when their services were most needed, farthest from the front; that they, whose hands could never be persuaded to handle the musket, are now most anxious with their tongues to keep alive memories that should be forgotten.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I beg pardon for detaining the House thus long.

I only desired to reply to what I conceived to be an unjust reflection upon the Military Committee of this House.

Mr. MacDOUGALL. I desire to be allowed two minutes to address

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I desire to be allowed two minutes to address a question to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING.]

The CHAIRMAN. This can only go on by unanimous consent. There is a motion pending that the committee rise. Is there objection to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACDOUGALL.] being heard?

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I desire to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. This can only proceed by unanimous consent, and objection is made

Mr. WOODWORTH. I have only one word to say; that is all.
Mr. HOLMAN. I hope objection will not be made to the gentleman being heard.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I only rose to say a single word, and I think the House will bear with me for a moment while I do so.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WOODWORTH] be heard.

There was no objection. Mr. WOODWORTH. My colleague [Mr. Banning] has seen fit to read a very long paper to me, and I hope it will be profitable to me read a very long paper to me, and I hope it will be profitable to me so far as there is any profit in it. If he had taken the pains to read a little further in the speech from which he quoted, that I delivered here last Saturday, he would have seen that I intended no arraignment of his committee—the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BANNING. To arraign a man, and then tell him you do not mean it, is not very pleasant.

Mr. WOODWORTH. The gentleman would not yield, and I do not wish him to interpret.

wish him to interrupt me,

If, sir, the fact of the introduction of a bill on the 24th of January, and the failure of the committee to make any report upon it, or to communicate in any way with the author of the bill, intimating to him that he has an opportunity of being heard before that committee, would not justify the suspicion to which I gave expression in that part of my speech quoted by the gentleman, then I do not understand the force and effect of such great delays.

Mr. BANNING. Did the gentleman ever undertake to communi-

Mr. WOODWORTH. I am very glad now to learn that our Military Committee is in favor of the bill which the gentleman has referred to, and which was discussed by myself in my remarks last Saturday. I should have been glad to have learned that before.

Mr. BANNING. The gentleman knows it now.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I am a little apprehensive, however, that the gentleman's statement in that regard may be somewhat in the notice of his loss and remarkable statement, as to the President's the gentleman's statement in that regard may be somewhat in the nature of his loose and remarkable statement as to the President's vetoing the bounty bill of last winter. I fear that this is as apocryphal as his statement in regard to the veto, though for the sake of the victims of the war I hope not. Let me say to the chairman of the Military Committee, what the chairman of the Military Committee of this House it seems to me anoth to know that no bounts bill was aven Military Committee, what the chairman of the Military Committee of this House it seems to me ought to know, that no bounty bill was ever vetoed by President Grant, and that the bounty bill of last Congress passed the House and passed the Senate, but failed because of a mistake in the conference committee's report. And I am surprised that my colleague is not familiar with this fact. If the interests of our unbountied soldiers and soldiers' widows and orphans is to rest upon the pleasure of a committee whose chairman knows so little of the history of a Congress of which he was a member I am sorry. That history of a Congress of which he was a member, I am sorry. That is all I desire to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. Cox having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SAYLER reported that the Committee of the Whole, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under considerable the control of the World of the sideration the bill (H. R. No. 612) to carry into effect a convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, signed on the 30th day of January, 1875; and had come to no resolution thereon.

tion; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved. That a special committee of seven be appointed to inquire whether any officer or official of the Government of the United States, or any person or persons in the employ of the Government, or connected therewith, have in any way advised, counseled with, or, directly or indirectly, verbally or in writing communicated to, any of the defendants or the friends, agents or attorneys of them, in the prosecutions recently tried in the city of Saint Louis, Missouri, any of the plans, facts, papers, or other evidence on which the Government relied, or it was believed would rely in conducting s-id prosecutions. Said committee shall ascertain whether any attempt was at any time made by any officer or official of the Government, other than the district attorney and his assistants, to interfere with, advise concerning, or in any way control the conduct of said prosecutions or any of them. The committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, cause the attendance of witnesses, administer oaths, sit during the sessions of the House, and report their proceedings to the House for action at any time. They shall reduce to writing and return with their report all evidence taken before them and all exhibits filed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman yield to allow me to offer a resolution?

Mr. SOUTHARD. I am willing to yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GAUSE] to introduce a bill for reference only.
Mr. GAUSE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to establish certain post-routes in the State of Arkansas.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can do that under the

An act (S. No. 416) for the relief of C. H. Frederick, late a lieutenant-colonel in the Ninth Missouri Infantry.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sympson, one of its clerks, announced the passage of an act (H. R. No. 2270) to provide for the purchase of material and for the continuation of the work on the building of a custom-house and post-office at Saint Louis, Missouri, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The question was upon Mr. Southard's motion that the House do

TUESDAY, March 7, 1876.

Prayer by Rev. A. WOODBURY, of Providence, Rhode Island. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

XECUTIVE COMMUNICATION

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, trausmitting a letter from Major John J. Upham, Fifth Cavalry, stating that section 2139 of the Revised Statutes is by the ruling of the United States district court regarded as excepting Indians from the penalty of introducing intoxicating liquors into the Indian Territory, and inviting the attention of Congress to the recommendation of Major Upham for such legislation as will correct the evil.

The PRESIDENT protempore. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and printed, if there be no objection.

Mr. CONKLING. I venture to call the attention of the Chair to Mr. CONKLING. I venture to call the attention of the Chair to the propriety of sending the communication to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and I will assign my reason to the Chair, which can then be judged of. It is desirable that corrections, if there be such in the statutes, should, as many as may, be embraced in some one bill and should not be found scattered over the statute-book. The Committee on the Revision of the Laws I understand is engaged assiduously in collecting these instances. Therefore if the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, who I see in his seat, should agree with me, I should feel more confident than I did at first in suggesting the propriety of sending this communication to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws that they might embrace it in their general bill rather than have it go separately.

Mr. ALLISON. It always gives me pleasure to agree with the Senator from New York, especially on this subject. I think the communication had better go to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That reference will be made, if there be no objection.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SAULSBURY presented a petition of citizens of Delaware, praying for an improvement of the navigation of the Jones Creek and Dover River, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McMILLAN presented the memorial of John Schroeder, in favor of an amendment of the homestead law, so as to save innocent settlers from the rules and regulations of the General Land Office; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of Horace L. Emery, praying for the extension of his patent for improvement in cotton-ginning machines: which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

machines; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the petition of George Whittaker, late a private in Company C, Twelfth Regiment New Jersey Volunteers, praying restoration of pay and an honorable discharge; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. Martha Irwin, of Camden City, New Jersey, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of E. Valeton de Boissiere, a citizen of Franklin County, Kansas, praying the passage of a law placing machinery for manufacturing raw silk imported into the United States on the free list; which was referred to the Committee on Finance

Mr. WHYTE presented the petition of Hodyer Bros.; Hamilton Easter & Co., and other merchants of Baltimore, Maryland, praying that the bankrupt law be not repealed, but amended; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of the establishment of a tri-weekly mail route from Marquette, in the county of Green Lake, via Kingston, to Portage, in Columbia County; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. WRIGHT. Some days since I had the honor to present a bill granting a pension to Armstead Goodlow, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions. I now present a petition and accompanying papers in support of the bill. I move their reference to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. INGALLS. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom were referred the bill (S. No. 100) to establish an insurance department and to provide for the incorporation and regulation of insurance companies in the District of Columbia, and the bill (S. No. 181) to amend section 593 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, have instructed me to report a bill in the nature of a substitute for both of these bills. I ask that the new bill may be read and placed upon the Calendar and printed, and that the bills No. 100 and No. 181 may be indefinitely postponed.

The bill (S. No. 569) to provide for the incorporation and regula-tion of insurance companies in the District of Columbia was read tion of insurance companies in each and passed to the second reading.

The other bills will be postponed.

and passed to the second reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The other bills will be postponed indefinitely, if there be no objection.

Mr.PADDOCK. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 256) to confirm certain school indemnity selections of public lands by the State of Nebraska, to report it without amendment. I send to the desk with the bill a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which is a sufficient explanation of the bill, and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be reported at length for information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Secretary read as follows:

Department of the Interior, General Land Office,

Washington, D. O., February 8, 1876.

Sir: In reference to Senate bill No. 256, entitled "A bill to confirm certain school indennity selections of public lands by the State of Nebraska," which you filed in this Office for an expression of my views thereon, I have the honor to state that it appears that Nebraska, having the right to select school lands under the acts of 20th May, 1826, and 20th February, 1859, (now sections 2275 and 2276 of the Revised Statutes) as indemnity for lands in sections 16 and 36, granted for schools, but which were otherwise disposed of on account of pre-emption claims acquired prior to survey, or from other causes, selected certain lands as such indemnity, and on their being reported to this Office and examined here, the selections, to the amount of 31,611.86 acres, were found to embrace tracts lying within the alternate sections reserved to the United States in acts of Congress making land grants for railroad purposes, and the price thereof fixed at $2.50 per acre, and which come under the operation of the act of Congress of March 6, 1868, providing that the lands therein referred to shall be subject only to entry under the pre-emption and homestead laws.

This Office holds that where, as in this case, the sections for the benade of indemnity for tracts lying therei, which have been otherwise disposed of, this may be done from the alternate reserved sections, within the same limits, the price of which is fixed at $2.50 per acre, where there is no express provision of law to prevent it; but in the case of these selections, the prohibition contained in the act of March 6, 1868, of any other disposal of the lands than such as is provided for in the pre-emption and homestead laws, stands in the way of the approval thereof; that prohibition extending to the even-numbered sections along the routes of the several roads mentioned in the act of July 1, 1862, entitled, "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," and the acts amendatory thereof. (See act of March 6, 1868, Statutes, volume 15, page 39.)

Apart from the prohibition referred to, there is no reason why the tracts called for in these selections should not be appropriated for the purpose of their selection which would not apply to any other tracts held at the double minimum price which might be selected. I think that this bill (S. No. 256) should be passed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

L. K. LIPPINCOTT.

L. K. LIPPINCOTT, Acting Commissioner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

No. 391) to authorize the Secretary of War to purchase for the use of the United States a parcel of land at Key West, Florida, now the property of Walter C. Maloney and wife, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report thereon; which was or-

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Daniel Edwards, of New Orleans, praying payment for certain commissions contracted to be paid him on sale of crops and supplies furnished for securing the same on Oaklands and Pointe Céleste plantations, Louisiana, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McMILLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 572) for the relief of settlers upon the reserved Government sections of the public lands within railroad limits; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PADDOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 573) to amend section 1113, Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to the appointment of Army sutlers; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 574) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies,'" approved March 13, 1874; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be

THE REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. GORDON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved. That the Committee on Finance be instructed to ascertain, if possible, what amendments to our revenue laws are necessary to secure economy and certainty in the collection of internal revenue, and prevent the recurrence of official frauds in that branch of the public service.

I do not wish this resolution acted on at present. I ask that it lie on the table, and to-morrow, or the day after to-morrow, as my friend from West Virginia [Mr. Davis] informs me that the bill for the admission of New Mexico is the special order for to-morrow, if it be the pleasure of the Senate I will ask to amend it by some additional resolutions which I am now preparing, at which time I hope to make some remarks showing the extent of these frauds and what amend-ments in my judgment are necessary to the revenue laws to prevent their recurrence in the future. I will name the day after to-morrow for this purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table; and the Senator from Georgia expresses a desire to submit some remarks upon it the day after to-morrow.

DESTRUCTIVE INSECTS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. As there is no other morning business, I move that the Senate take up Senate bill No. 438. The Senate is aware that there have been a great many petitions presented from all parts of the country, from the agriculturists and the farmers of the country, asking that Congress shall appoint a commission to gather information in reference to the destructive insects which have so materially damaged the wealth of the nation. A bill was presented which provided for three commissioners with a salary of $5,000 each. Instead of that the Committee on Agriculture have unanimously reported back an amendment which provides for one commissioner whose term of office shall be for one year with a salary of $4,000, he to be selected by the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How can that be done? Is he an officer of the United States?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suppose that the Commissioner of Agriculture can select one to perform the duty under him. He already has one entomologist, and I do not see that there is any difficulty in such an appointment being made. However, will the Senator consent to hear the bill read?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; let us hear the bill read. The Chief Clerk read the bill (S. No. 438) for the protection of agriculture against injurious insects.

Mr. LOGAN. Is the bill up for consideration?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the motion.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to make any point on the bill; but I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator from New Jersey. I do not exactly understand why it is that a person should be appointed for the purpose here named, when the reports of the Interior Department and the reports of the Agricultural Department are filled with scientific reports made by the entomologists who have traveled with the different surveys in the various Territories and the reports of the entomologists of the different States on all these subjects. If the Senator will have the reports examined, he will find that Professor Thomas, a man who understands as much of that branch of science as any man in this country, traveled with the Hayden survey for three or four years, at $1,800 a year. He made reports on this subject every year, reports that have been copied all over Europe, and one that is considered better authority than any other report made in this country. Our surveys took with them an entomologist nearly always—I know the Hayden survey did—and they examined these very questions and reported on them. Professor Thomas, who was with that survey for years, is now entomologist of Illinois, and has made reports on all these subjects. The Smithsonian Institution and the Agricultural Department can obtain the reports of the entomologists of the different States without this officer at this great expense. I should say $4,000 a year was an extravagant salary for a man in that business. It is higher than any man detailed for that purpose anywhere in this country has ever received.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is the bill up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to take it up.

Mr. MAXEY. I would suggest an amendment to the second section to include the cotton-worm.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will accept that after the bill is taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to take up the bill.

The motion was agreed; there being on a division—ayes 30, noes 9. So the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 438) for the protection of agriculture against injurious insects.

The Committee on Agriculture reported the bill with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, and the Commissioner of Agriculture are hereby authorized to appoint a commissioner having the requisite scientific and practical knowledge, whose duty it shall be to investigate and gather information relative to those insects which are most destructive to the crops of farmers and planters, and especially of the Rocky Mountain locust, the chinch-bug, the army-worm, the Hessian fly, potato-bug, and other insects injurious to the great staples, wheat, corn, and cotton, in order to devise success:... methods for the destruction of such insects; and to make public from time to tame such information and such practical instructions for the suppression of the different insects referred to; and that the commissioner report the results of such investigation and information to the Commissioner of Agriculture, by whom the same shall be submitted to Congress.

SEC. 2. That the said commissioner shall be appointed for the term of one year, and, in case of a vacancy, the same shall be filled for the residue of the term only; and he shall receive $4,000 per annum, to be paid monthly from the date of original appointment, and shall be paid his traveling and other personal expenses incident to the discharge of his duties, to be audited by the Commissioner of Agriculture, not exceeding, for the year, $2,000. And the said Commissioner of Agriculture, not exceeding, for the year, $2,000. And the said Commissioner of Agriculture, and shall be also the inspects such aid as is in his power, and such clerical assistance, office-room, fuel, stationery, and chemicals as are at his disposal; and the printing of necessary circulars and blanks incident to the duties of the said commissioner shall be done, at the expense of the Government, at the Government Printing Office.

Sec. 3. That the sum of $6,000 is hereby appropriated for the purpose of carrying out the objects of this act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the bill by striking out the clause as to the power of appointment in the first section vested in the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution and the Commissioner of Agriculture, and so on, and make it read:

That the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may appoint.

I do this because it does not appear to me that under the Constitu-tion we are authorized to confer the power of appointing a distinct officer who is acting under the law and with the tenure of a definite time named in the law and with a salary to be paid directly to him out of the public Treasury, in the way that the amendment reported by the committee provides. I therefore move to make it read that the President shall appoint with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read. The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in another part of the bill. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. After "army-worm," in line 10, section 1, I move to insert "the cotton-worm."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will entertain any question that is relevant

Mr. SARGENT. There is one more destructive than any other; I move to insert "worm of the still." [Laughter.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is not a single duty enjoined by this bill on this newly appointed officer at $4,000 a year that is not required to be done by the Commissioner of Agriculture, and that cannot be done by him or some of his subordinates under him. It seems to me the only effect is to increase the salary of the entomologist of the Agriculture Department from the present amount of $1,800 or $2,000 to $4,000 a year. I am disposed on that ground to vote against it.

I have no doubt that the information desired is valuable. can adopt any plan for destroying the insects named in the bill, I shall be glad of it. I would be willing to give thousands and even hundreds of thousands of dollars if a plan could be devised to destroy these insects; but a man with a salary of $4,000 a year will have a poor chance when the Smithsonian Institution, the Agriculture Dea poor chance when the Smithsonian Institution, the Agriculture Department, and scientific men in all parts of the world are addressing their attention to this subject. I think it is perfectly idle for us to set a man at $4,000 a year, and $2,000 for expenses, and $25,000 probably to print his lucubrations, to perform this work.

I voted to take up the bill and consider it; but I shall certainly vote against its passage. I think the law is now ample. The Commissioner of Agriculture has power now to detail any officer of his Department to attend to this business, to examine into it, not only to make his own observations but to gather from the observations of Department to attend to this business, to examine into it, not only to make his own observations but to gather from the observations of others. All their reports are accessible to him; all the information that can be had in this country as to the various worms spoken of in the bill can be had by him, and he can give us the information in his annual report on agriculture, where it will properly come and be printed at the public expense.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Commissioner of Agriculture is stationed here at Washington. He has his duties to perform here. It is entirely out of his power for him to travel to different portions of the country to gather information in reference to these most destructive insects. Therefore the Commissioner cannot perform this duty. There is an entomologist in that Department who is constantly at work. The petitions which came here were to have three appointed; work. The petitions which came here were to have three appointed; but this bill provides that this commissioner shall co-operate with them, get the information from different sections of the country. Not only that, it provides that he shall at once give instructions as to the best means of destroying these injurious insects. It is provided that he shall from time to time publish the result of his researches. Now, as to the amount of salary, $4,000, if it is too much, make it less; but my opinion is that you cannot get a scientific man who is qualified for this duty for a lower compensation. It seems to me that it is very little that the great agricultural interests of the country ask. They do, and have from all parts of the country by their petitions requested this legislation, only in a much more ample and extravagant manner than we have reported. It is the great wealth of the nation, and they come here and ask an appropriation of $5,000 or $6,000. You spend hundreds of thousands for the protection of commerce and manufactures; and here is the great wealth of the nation, and those who insects, and they ask Congress, exercising their judgment on this subject, and they are the parties interested, to give them this small relief. I think this bill ought to pass without a dissenting voice.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Illiunderstand this subject better than we do do not find it a thing to laugh at, do not find it a thing to ridicule. They see their crops stricken off, they see whole counties and States impoverished by these nois evidently entirely misapprehend the purposes, objects, and scope of this bill. It is very true that a scientific entomologist has accompanied Professor Hayden and the other explorers of the Western States and Territories and the region lying within and beyond the Rocky Mountains, who has made various reports upon those insects that are most destructive to vegetation. It is also true, as the Senator from Ohio has said, that there is a department in the Agricultural Bureau from which information can be obtained in regard to the habits and the destructive statistics of these various pests that are now threatening, not only the prosperity, but the actual habitation of certain portions of the West.

I observe that the feeble attempts at jocularity, derision, and ridicule that assail this bill come from sections of the country that have not been particularly exposed to the depredation of these insects. venture the assertion that there are but very few of the Senators on this floor who are aware of the fact that the annual loss to the productive resources of this country arising from the ravages of these insects is not less than $300,000,000. If that is a subject for jocularity, or ridicule, or mirth, or derision, I am not aware of the basis upon which these gentlemen's facetiousness is to be conducted. The loss to the agriculture of the Mississippi Valley during the last year from the depredations of the Rocky Mountain locusts alone exceeds—from actual statistics that have been collected by the various agricultural departments of that section of the country—more than $50,000,000; and it is not too much to say that since the year 1860 enough has been lost to the resources, the productive capacity, and the material wealth of this country by the depredations of these insects to have paid and extinguished the entire national debt.

This is a subject, therefore, which appears to me to be worthy of consideration. The area of our country that is liable to these invasions extends from the British Possessions on the north, in an irregular triangle bounded on the west by the Rocky Mountains and extending east over a portion of the States of Iowa and Minnesota through the western line of Illinois, embracing Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri, the Indian Territory, and a portion of Texas, extending as far south as Dallas. I venture the assertion that unless something is done to prevent or guard against these annual incursions very large tracts of the most fertile and productive portion of the valley of the Mississippi will become depopulated. There are portions of my State that, if they are hereafter subjected to successive repetitions of the losses and scourges that have arisen from these pests during the last three years, will become depopulated. It will be absolutely impossible for man to inhabit them.

Now, sir, the object of this bill is not, as some Senators seem to imagine, to produce scientific essays on the habits of these insects; but by means of examination and investigation to report whether or but by means of examination and investigation to report whether or not civilization has not some resources by which these invasions can be resisted and their depredations repressed. Other nations have been subjected to similar visitations; and methods have been resorted to for the purpose of preventing them. It has not been considered unworthy the attention of the French government to inquire by governmental commissions into the causes and consequences of these insect depredations. In northern Africa, in Algeria, measures have been resorted to, under the auspices of that government, for the purpose of preventing these desolating visitations, that would otherwise render that portion of the world uninhabitable and valueless for productive purposes. productive purposes

What the agricultural portion of the West desires is that some investigation shall be made under national auspices for the purpose of reporting facts, and ascertaining whether or not some means cannot be devised by which these injurious depredations may be prevented hereafter. Several methods have been resorted to by other governments; bounties have been offered for the collection of the eggs of the locust; means have been adopted for the destruction of the young before they become fledged. The State of Minnesota during the last season, if I recollect aright, has adopted measures for the destruction of these insects in that State; and, if I am correctly informed, in of these insects in that State; and, if I am correctly informed, in seven counties nearly sixty thousand bushels of the unfledged young of the locust were destroyed and paid for by bounties offered by the county authorities, amounting in the aggregate to more than $80,000. If the visitations of these insects were confined to isolated and detached localities, it might well be considered as a matter for States to take care of; but when these vast armies ravage immense portions of the national domain, flying from State to State and from Territory to Territory, and destroying the crops and rendering portions of the country uninhabitable, it is certainly a matter for the nation to consider, because it affects not the States alone, but the Territories also and the resources of the whole country.

I am therefore at a loss to understand upon what theory this bill is met with derision or considered a subject for ridicule.

Mr. LOGAN. I am a little surprised to see the Senator have the understanding that his bill is to be killed by derision.

Mr. INGALLS. It is not my bill; it is reported by the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; a bill from the Committee on Agriculture. I believe the Senator introduced the bill. I had no such object in mind. I rose not so much to oppose the bill as to give my views in reference to it and to show the Senate that there was no economy in this bill, for the reason that the very same thing was being done by the Government and paid for. We have for some reason or other ingenious men in this country who, when a thing is being performed, are dissatisfied with the manner in which it is performed unless they themselves perform it. Hence a bill usually is offered to point out the mode and manner by some way that we will establish some new office and appoint some new officer to perform the very duties that are being performed by the Government. The Senate well knows that the very duties required to be performed in this bill have been performed by the different scientific men that are exploring the Territories of the country and geologizing the country. We have had a scientific man on this very subject, and who has reported on it time and again, and he is doing the same thing to-day.

and again, and he is doing the same thing to-day.

The Senator from Kansas says some means should be provided for the destruction of the locusts. God knows I wish there could be. I certainly represent an agricultural people. Very few States, I think, anywhere will go far ahead of mine in that respect. We have an entomologist in Illinois examining this very question, and his examination is reported here to the Agricultural Department and the Smithsonian Institution. My suggestion was that we should not duplicate the duties and pay twice for them. So far as the locusts are concerned, which have destroyed many times the corn crops in the Senator's State, I have seen the destruction myself. I would ask him what scientific man there is in this country or ever will be who can stop the locusts from being carried by the winds? The winds coming to the east from the mountains bring them there in great swarms upon the country, and they destroy the crops that you are producing there. We have a scientific report which shows that the locusts breed in the mountains on the eastern and southern slopes of the Rocky Mountains, and the winds from the west bearing them carry them over the plains. Now, if the Senator can tell me whether there is science in this country sufficient to stop the winds bearing the locusts on them, I am willing to agree that there may be something in it. So far as their destruction is concerned, I would rather trust an old farmer to-day to devise means for their destruction than any scientific man in this country. I know that last summer in the Territory of Colorado, where the locusts were destroying the crops, the old farmers them-selves were devising plans for the destruction of the locusts, plans, too, that were not devised by scientific men. I saw some of them around in some way for the purpose of catching them as they were flying. Whether it produced the result or not I could not say; but to a certain extent it did good. There is no question about that.

We have in the Agricultural Department to-day a scientific man nvestigating this very subject—a man who asks all the entomologists of the country everywhere to send him specimens of bugs, of worms, of locusts, of everything, that he may investigate them and report upon them. I ask, then, why should we have another at the expense of the Government? As far as the habits of the locusts are concerned, we have had a report in reference to them. Their places and the times of hatching their young have been investigated by scientific men, and they have reported in reference to them. If you want the investigation to go on, let the scientific men go on and investigate. I desire that they should, in the different States, make their reports as they have done heretofore, and let this man, upon their reports, give his opinion.

Why should Senators suggest that other Senators are opposed to why should Schators suggest that other Schators are opposed to the interest of the agriculturists of this country because they think this bill will not accomplish the object? You provide that one man shall investigate this whole question of all bugs, of locusts, of chinch-bugs, of potato-bugs, of the tobacco-worm, the army-worm, and all these destructive insects. To investigate all that and report thereon you give him one year to do it in.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My friend ought to be a little more logical than that. I understand that one objection to having this commissioner appointed is that there is plenty of force to do the work now. The next objection is that there is so much work that one man cannot do it.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. LOGAN. Is that the Senator's criticism on my argument? Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand it so.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand it so.

Mr. LOGAN. I will try to be more logical, so that the Senator can understand me. I said that when you were having work done, and when it was being done satisfactorily, there was no necessity for duplicating it. I said that. Does the Senator disagree with me in that? I stated that this work was being done by the scientific men of this country, that it had been reported upon, and that the scientific men that are out West in the Territories have an entomologist for the purpose of reporting in reference to these very insects. Now, does the Senator want it duplicated?

does the Senator want it duplicated?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have no doubt of my friend's interest in agriculture, and in the farmers, just as much as any of us; but I think he is mistaken on this subject. He has stated the effort which is being made in his State to eradicate this evil. The same has been done in Minnesota and in other States. Now, it seems to me that it would be of great service to have a commissioner who would at once, not when an agricultural report is published in a year or two, but who would at once gather up this information, and, as this bill provides, at once communicate it to different parts of the country, so that even this year there may be great relief from this pressing evil. The amount it costs is of no account compared with the magnitude of the object if there is any good to be attained.

Mr. LOGAN. The amount cuts very little figure in the case; but what I was going to say in connection with what I have said is that you already have the officer.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think not.

Mr. LOGAN. You have an entomologist in the Agricultural Department to-day performing that duty on a salary.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. LOGAN. Then why do you wish to duplicate it?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There is no doubt there is a Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. LOGAN. Not the Commissioner. I mean a man performing this specific duty, a scientific man. I do not remember his name, but I have been there and conversed with him on the subject.

I have been there and conversed with him on the subject.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Professor Glover.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. A very intelligent man; and he is occupied all the while, perhaps as industrious a man as there is in the country; but he cannot perform this duty of going to different sections of the country, gathering up this information, and then communicating it at once to the public. He has his whole time occupied in the investigations which he is making, the results of which we get in the Agricultural Report.

Mr. LOGAN. He performs the duty by staying there, and making up his report on information which he gains from all parts of the on this report on information which he gains from all parts of the country from scientific men who are investigating this very subject, and that is all that your commissioner that your bill provides for will do. It is simply nonsense, in my judgment, to say that you provide that one man shall travel over this country and investigate this whole subject. He cannot do it. It can only be done in the mode that I say it is now being done, that is, by receiving the information from all parts of the country, from scientific men, and collecting it here, and parts of the country, from scientific men, and collecting it here, and making it public for the benefit of the country. That is the only way it can be done. Your man that you will appoint under the bill will do the same thing. He will take a room in the Agricultural Department, and there he will sit down. He will ask for information from all parts of the country, probably have two or three clerks; he will send one of them to this State or that State; he cannot go to all the States. In some places the chinch-bug may prevail; in others, the locust; in others, a different character of insect. He cannot visit them all. There is but one way to obtain this information, and that is the way they are doing it to-day. If you provide for this officer, I ask the Senator why it is that you provide in every appropriation bill for the last four years for an officer of this very character to accompany our roving commissions of scientific men it. There is where your information comes from; it comes from these men at a much less your information comes from; it comes from these men at a much less cost to you than you provide for it in the bill. I believe, when you are getting information as you are, there is no necessity for this thing, unless the object is to appoint some man to a particular office, and exclude appropriations that are being used by other scientific men of a much less amount, because they are the men who have to go on scientific men of a many contractions. tific parties anyhow?

That is my objection to it; not because the object is not a good one; not because I do not desire that it shall be carried out; but because the origin of the bill seems to me to be for the benefit of some one, an increase of salary in his department, to do that which he cannot possibly do.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My friend may relieve his mind on that. am sure that there is no one in view at all.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not mean any such thing, so far as the Senator concerned, or so far as the committee is concerned.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not think there is the slightest reason for that intimation.

Mr. LOGAN. I have seen these statements made here often. A little bill is passed for the purpose of employing a man to do a certain thing for twelve months. That twelve months means the next fifty years. I have seen schools started in this country the same way, a little appropriation bill for an itiuerant school down at Fortress a little appropriation bill for an itinerant school down at Fortress Monroe some three or four years ago, and now it is a West Point in every appropriation bill. So it goes. This is the entering-wedge to a bureau for this purpose, for the purpose of continuing it as long as time shall last, or at least as long as this country shall last in its present organization. That is the meaning of it. All these new bureaus mean that; as witness your Educational Bureau. Call this what you please, the bureau of entomology, or the bug bureau—that is what it means. It means to start it and establish it, when they can perform no duty except that which is now heigh performed.

can perform no duty except that which is now being performed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to say a single word on this

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I hope we shall be allowed to take the

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to continuing the

The Chair hears none.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suppose there is not a Senator here who would not be in favor of the general purpose of this bill, which I take to be to ascertain some mode by which the great evil of the annual influx of locusts now devastating the western portion of the country may be avoided; but it seems to me this embraces too much. Professor Glover, of the Agricultural Department, is one of the most efficient men we have ever had on that subject, and he has made his investigations and reported upon the cotton-worm, upon the appleborer, and upon the wheat-midge, and various other insects that were destructive to vegetation years and years ago, and has a museum of these insects now in the Agricultural Department that probably surpasses that in any other portion of the country.

Mr. LOGAN. Allow me to ask the Senator whether or not Professor Glover has not received those specimens and the history of them from persons interested all over the country—from the fruit-growers and the farmers? He makes up his reports on that basis.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I was going on to say that there is not a strange insect, bug, or worm in any portion of the country that the correspondents of this Professor Glover fail to reach. They are constantly transmitted to him for examination and for report thereon. constantly transmitted to him for examination and for report thereon. If, therefore, gentlemen would confine this bill to something like the locust question—and I will say in relation to that as President Lincoln said about putting down the rebellion, it is a big job—I think it would receive the approbation of the Senate. Certainly it seems to me an anomaly to create a subordinate to receive about twice the salary of the present chief who has in charge this subject at the Agricultural Bureau. If the Senate should be disposed to make an appropriation to allow some party to be sent out specially to investigate the locust question, I should certainly have no objection to it.

Mr. McMILIAN. Mr. President, my own State is somewhat interested in the subject of this bill. The ravages of the locust there have been a source of great injury to our farming population. The have been a source of great injury to our farming population. The Senator from Kansas has correctly stated that we have suffered very severely in that direction, so much so that our own State has taken some action in this matter. His excellency the governor of the State, upon the representations of citizens of the State, deemed it his duty to appoint a commission to investigate this matter. They were sent to the portions of the country which were devastated by the ravages of the locusts. They made practical observations in regard to it, not spirit figure in the devastated by the ravages of the locusts. scientifically into the nature of the locusts, but as to the destruction they were creating and the methods of overcoming them, and various means were tried there, such as ditching, and burning, and using other instrumentalities for catching the locusts as they flew. A report has been made upon that subject by this commission, and in view of the importance of the subject the Legislature of my own State has transmitted a memorial to the Senate of the United States, which has been referred to the Committee on Agriculture of this body. has been referred to the Committee on Agriculture of this body.

The Senator from Illinois is certainly mistaken in his supposition that there is any special purpose of having an appointee whose personal interests shall be advanced by this bill. This bill is the result of sonal interests shall be advanced by this bill. This bill is the result of numerous petitions sent to this body, of memorials of the State Legislatures, all expressions of the desire and interest of the people on the frontier in regard to this subject. I do not understand that this bill provides for an officer who shall sit in his office in Washington and study the nature of these insects. I understand that he is to visit the sections of country which are injured and suffering injury from this great evil, that he is there, with the scientific knowledge he may possess, to make examinations and observations, and report on the subject of his mission.

This has been of so much importance that the counties in our State

This has been of so much importance that the counties in our State have incurred large expenses in the destruction of these insects. The State has also expended in this direction; and the burden is so great and the injury so extensive that the several States affected by it should not be called upon to bear the entire burden, and they have referred it to the General Government, and ask the Government to give its at-tention to a subject of national importance; and the result of all this matter is the measure introduced by the Committee on Agriculture. It is a matter which should receive the serious attention of the Senate; it is a matter in which some action should be taken in the nature of that suggested by the committee; and so far as I have examined the bill I see no reason why it should not pass.

Mr. LOGAN. I offer an amendment now to strike out a large part of the bill, and let it read simply—

That it shall be the duty of the Agricultural Department to investigate and gather information relative to those insects which are most destructive to the crops of farmers and planters, and especially the Rocky Mountain locust, chinch-bug, army-worm, cotton-worm, tobacco-worm, the Hessian fly, and other insects injurious to the great staples, wheat, corn, and cotton, in order to devise such successful methods for the destruction of such insects; and to make public from time to time such information and such practical instructions for the suppression of the different insects referred to; and that the Commissioner shall report the results of such information to the Congress of the United States.

And there I propose to stop, except the appropriation for the amount of expenditure. Then it will leave the Agricultural Department, which is the proper Department, to investigate this subject in such manner as it sees proper. I think they are investigating it properly now; but this requires the Commissioner to make the investigation. He can do it through any one he chooses; people all over the Territories and in the States to whom he applies will give him information.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. What did the Senator say as to the appropriation? Mr. LOGAN. So far as the appropriation is concerned for the Agricultural Department carrying out this scientific exploration or examination, or whatever it may be termed, I have nothing to say.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Does the Senator strike it out or leave it

Mr. LOGAN. I leave it for the Senate to decide whether it will appropriate anything or not. But instead of appointing an officer with a bureau, my ameudment requires the Agricultural Commissioner to perform this duty or have it performed. That will be the bill if so amended. I move to strike out "commissioner" wherever it occurs except "Commissioner of Agriculture," so as to leave the whole matter in his hands to make the investigation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What has become of the regular order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair announced that the morning hour had expired, and by unanimous consent the pending bill was continued before the Senate.

bill was continued before the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. The other morning a bill of not very large concern except locally was considered a little while and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Sherman] objected. I think he has no further objection, and at some moment before the regular order is taken up, I will ask the Senate to allow a vote to be taken upon that bill. I think there will be no debate about it, and time is of some consequence. It is a bill applying certain provisions to the port of Genesee, New York.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I am always disposed, where there is a matter of pure local cognizance, to listen with great deference to the wishes of Senators who represent the locality; but where, as in this case, it is a proposition to create a new office with salary and expenses to be paid by the national Treasury, with the probability that it will be continued from year to year, as has been our experience in the past; and then the friends of the legislation say that their purpose is simply to make a way to take from the Treasury of the United States the means by which that which they call a pest shall be destroyed, and which will be very expensive, it becomes a question of national concern; and it seems to me that I cannot listen merely to the representatives of the locality whose constituents may petition them in sentatives of the locality whose constituents may petition them in sentatives of the locality whose constituents may petition them in that regard.

It is the tendency of the congressional mind, whenever relief is asked for by their constituents, to rush immediately into the creation of some commission or new office. It is a ridiculous tendency. I presume that I am guilty of it as much as any other Senator. It seems to be the universal panacea. Our people are suffering in a particular locality; let us create an office, and pay for it out of the Treasury, to inquire into and report upon it, and that will be all right; that answers the local demand! We go back to our constituents and say, "See how zealous we have been; here is this man inquiring into the matter." That means "it is all right, and you should be satisfied." It does not remedy any evil; and especially it is not proper where we have machinery already provided by law, and paid for, which would accomplish the same results.

I am not in favor of the amendment of my friend from Illinois to this bill, or of the original bill. The Revised Statutes of the United this bill, or of the original bill. The Revised Statutes of the United States on page 87 substantially give the powers which are contained in the amended bill, and go far to answer the object, if it can be answered, of the original bill. Section 526 provides that—

The Commissioner of Agriculture shall procure and preserve all information concerning agriculture which he can obtain by means of books and correspondence, and by practical and scientific experiments, accurate records of which experiments shall be kept in his office, by the collection of statistics, and by any other appropriate means within his power.

Here is a grant of power as great as that conferred on this new commissioner to be created. It requires him further to "collect new and valuable seeds and plants," and propagate them in a certain manner. He has power to make practical and scientific experiments; he has power to obtain information by books and by correspondence. He collects statistics and facts bearing upon this subject, and any subject which is mentioned in this bill. He has at his command men who are paid by the Government to investigate these matters, upon the very ground itself. The whole history of the locust has been given, or if not, will speedily be given by our scientific expeditions—I mean the locust in his cradle, in his very home, showing his modes of migration, where he alights, and the consequences. All these facts Here is a grant of power as great as that conferred on this new I mean the locust in his cradle, in his very home, showing his modes of migration, where he alights, and the consequences. All these facts are collected by our scientific men, and poured in here upon Congress. Now, is it not vain to say that it is necessary to create another office to look over this same horizon, to ascertain how these animals are developed, and by what laws their migration is controlled? All these things are now under our very hand, and passing through the Government Printing Office, and not this year only, but in past years. It has been a matter of continuous scientific and valuable study; and I ask whether we should duplicate these duties.

ask whether we should duplicate these duties.

You may say that these things are undigested, that these are trifling discoveries which are made and reported, but that you should come down to the result that should be deduced from them all. Then I say that under this section 526 there is a man who is paid by law to digest these very things, to make experiments if it be necessary, and to report to Congress directly. He has power to make these reports by monthly publications going out to farmers all over the country and it is a mere ridiculous subterfuge when there is a question of that kind presented to us that we rush to the creation of a new officer and pay him out of the Treasury. I say it is ridiculous, and therefore we ridicule it. It is ridiculous to put on any one man's shoulders, and pay him out of the Treasury. I say it is indicatous, and therefore we ridicule it. It is ridiculous to put on any one man's shoulders, and he paid $4,000 a year, to look into all these matters, from the locust to the army-worm, himself, with various portions of the country to be visited, different climates considered, different regions—all to be considered by one man. How is it to be done? Merely by correspondence. Is not that correspondence provided for by the section of law I have read? Can this man more intelligently conduct that correspondence than the gentlemen of the Agricultural Department under the direction of the chief of the Agricultural Office?

But they say that here is an immense destruction of material prosperity and of property which should be arrested. I admit that, and some intelligent steps were taken in Minnesota and elsewhere toward this end. But it is said that this ought not to be left to the States to do; that the General Government should be saddled with this duty; that provision should be made out of the Treasury for this purpose that provision should be made out of the Treasury for this purpose. That I contest. I contest it because it would be impossible for the Treasury of the United States to stand the strain which would be brought upon it provided it was required to chase down and destroy all the long variety of animals which are named in the bill. It is to furnish a bounty, according to the theory of my friend from Minnesota and that of the Senator from Kansas, to destroy especially the Rocky Mountain locust, the chinch-bug, the army-worm, the cotton-worm, the tobacco-worm, the Hessian fly, the potato-bug, and other insects injurious to the great staples. This is an extraordinary duty to devolve upon the Government of the United States. They say, however, that we ought to do it, and on the same principle exactly we ought to provide guano to restore wasted lands, we ought to provide the means of irrigation for the broad valleys which are parched in the sun during the exceptional years of drought, because see what immense sunduring the exceptional years of drought, because see what immense values of property are destroyed.

Mr. McMILLAN. Allow me to suggest that the amendments referred to with reference to the tobacco-worm and several other insects have been added since the Senate went into Committee of the Whole. The Committee on Agriculture I understand did not embrace them. The bill was intended to apply to the destruction of grain upon our western frontier, corn and wheat, which has become so very great as to be of national importance. I do not understand that there are any evils complained of with reference to the other insects and that these were inserted merely as additions to the bill, that some inquiry should be made as to the character of the insects themselves, not to apply to the great ravages which have marked the

Mr. SARGENT. I should fail to make myself understood, if it was inferred from my remarks that I intended any reflection on the committee that reported the bill or on any Senator. I do nothing of the kind. I am discussing the bill which is before us, and the bill is, as I have cited it, the bill which we are now asked to vote upon and pass or reject.

If this principle were admitted, that we ought to offer bounties to prevent the ravages of the locust, &c., it would follow that we should be liable for damages for injuries which they caused during the time we neglected that duty. If it were true that we should do this on account of the great destruction of property, we still more ought to make good the ravages caused by the Mississippi which passes through many States, gathering its flood of waters, occasionally breaking its dikes and spreading over the country. We ought by all means to take on the nation the charge of penning those waters within their original current, and if they break loose, repair the damages and make compensation therefor, which they may cause on all sides by their overflow.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think the Senator is under a misapprehension of the bill if he finds in this bill anything that looks to the Government paying bounties.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator from Kansas, and more expressly the Senator from Minnesota, said that it was impossible for the States to cope with this matter, and that it ought not to be expected of them; that the General Government ought to relieve them of the burden.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Their speeches are not in the bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUISEN. Their speeches are not in the bill.
Mr. SARGENT. The commentary runs with the text. I have a right to judge of the bill by the inferences of its friends.
Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not think the Senator has a right to infer that that is in the bill which by reading it he sees is not in the bill, and then to characterize it and depreciate the bill because it is in.
Mr. SARGENT. No; but I have a right to say that it would be my own natural inference from it as an entering-wedge in order to produce the other result, and I will tell the Senator why. Why is it that this new officer is to be appointed † In order to collect this information. Have we not information here; is it not being sent by the most valuable channels; collected by the most responsible men and the most scientific men, paid for doing it, and filed in here upon us? Is there any doubt about the habits of these insects? Is there any doubt as to the best method of destroying them?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I can answer the Senator that my view of the propriety of the bill is that here is what amounts to a national of the propriety of the bill is that here is what amounts to a national calamity, an evil which impairs the national wealth or diminishes our taxes hundreds, thousands, and millions of dollars; and therefore I think it is our duty, whether any State has applied to us or not, to start an investigation in reference to it. That is one reason. Another reason is because I do not think it is in the power of any one State to gather this information. It may gather information in the particular State; but here is an evil which is stretched over a great region of country, and it wants some person to communicate with these different localities and to concentrate all the information and become the organ to impart it to every part of the country. Those are the reasons why I think it is a subject for the nation to take charge of. One word more, if my friend will permit me.

Mr. SARGENT. I would like to reply to that first.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My friend has called our attention to the statute. There is no doubt but that the statute provides for the Department of Agriculture gathering this information, and all the encomiums which have been pronounced on the entomologist who is there employed are deserved; but they do and have been doing all they can. Now there is an exigency upon the country. It is desired to get this information so that it may be valuable in the coming and approaching season; and it was for that reason that I pressed the approaching season; and it was for that reason that I pressed the bill this morning. The Commissioner of Agriculture and his force can do no more than they have been doing, and we ought to make this appointment under this particular exigency.

Mr. SARGENT. It is because I contend that the power is within the Department of Agriculture; it is because I see clearly that the power which the Senator says should be exercised by the Government of the United States of paternal supervision which he would have in this matter was years ago created in the Department of Agriculture, and that is supplemented by the appropriations which we annually make for scientific expeditions, that I do not think the only merit which the Senator claims for this bill exists. If it were not for this provision and the Commissioner of Agriculture were not exercising provision and the Commissioner of Agriculture were not exercising these powers, and the entomologist was not giving us the scientific deductions from the facts collected by the exploring expeditions, then there might be something in it; but all this operation is going on and going on expensively to the Government of the United States. No single State is required to collect this information; we are collecting the information for all the States. But suppose that this commissioner thus appointed comes in and recommends that the Government of the United States shall pay out of its Treasury a bounty for the destruction of these insects, will the Senator then be in favor of adopting the suggestion of the commissioner? I ask him, suppose that your commissioner reports to Congress that an appropriation ought to be made out of the Treasury as bounties in order to insure the destruction of these insects, would the Senator be in favor of such

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I certainly would not.

Mr. SARGENT. Then those who insist upon this bill to get information in order to show the duty of the Government see that even the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture would not consent to an appropriation of this kind. I say if the power exists it ought to be extended not merely to the great objects which I mentioned, as, for instance, the Mississippi which overflows its banks, which we ought to guard because it runs through different States, but you can come down to particular States, in my State, and I believe also in the State of Oregon, and there our wheat crop is very seriously impaired by squirrels, and our counties are paying very large bounties. It cost one county, Contra Costa, I believe, eight or ten thousand dollars during last year as bounties for the poisoning or destruction of squirrels which otherwise would have rendered the county uninhabitable. which otherwise would have rendered the county uninhabitable. Should not the Government offer bounties for that purpose to relieve the county of Contra Costa, Alameda, and other counties in my State from ravages of that kind? Ought not "squirrel" to be put in here between "Hessian fly" and "potato-bug," if that classification would do? It would seem that just the same destruction is being wrought by this quadruped that is wrought by insects in the other case, and upon exactly the same kind of interest; and to a very serious amount is classified from the text leaves are removed. as is obvious from the very large amount of bounties we have been compelled to pay for years in counties in my State in order to prevent these ravages and destructions.

We have found by experience and we have learned by reading the reports of the Agricultural Department the best method for the destruction of these pests, and so when any of the districts named in this bill are invaded any one who desires information can obtain it from the Agricultural Department specifically and fully, and infor-mation is coming from all sources all the time into the reservoir there provided by Congress to receive it and distribute it to the people. Then why create officers, why create commission upon commission, unless there is a reasonable hope that the effect will be that the Government will assume the duty of killing these noxious insects and appropriating out of its Treasury enormous amounts for that purpose and thereby relieving counties and States? Very little interest would be taken in this bill if it had no other object, because if it is a mere question of information as to the habits of animals we have it all; or, if not, we have the means organized to procure it. Unquestionably the forthcoming reports will be full of valuable information on that matter, which will go out through all these channels to those who are most interested in the subject. But the object of the bill, the after-thought, is that Congress itself will take this burden upon it. Seeing as I think—I speak humbly—further than the Committee on Agriculture on this matter, that this is a mere opening-wedge, taking warning from the new advances of the advocates of the bill, I am not disposed to favor it, because I can see no advantage in creating an office to give information we already have unless it may be an after-thought to divert the Treasury of the United States to that

Mr. HARVEY. I merely wish to say that I think I can satisfy my friend, the Senator from California, and other Senators that the General Government has an important interest in this matter; as he is aware, and all the Senators here have the same knowledge, the General Government is a large landed proprietor in all that portion of this continent lying between the Missouri River and the Sierra Nevada

Mountains; and he is no doubt also aware that a distinguished officer of the United States Army is now engaged in promulgating through public prints and in other ways the statement that all that portion of this continent where the Government owns such large landed possessions is and must remain a desert unfit for human habitation; and in support of that view one of the reasons that he cites is this quotation from a report of General Warren:

A fourth might be named—the occasional visits of grasshoppers. They often fill the air like a shower of rain or the smoke of a prairie fire. The height of their flight may be inferred from the fact of their being seen high in the air from a peak of the Rocky Mountains, eighty-five hundred feet above the surrounding plain, and fourteen thousand five hundred feet above the sea, and the sound of their wings was like the rushing of a railroad train.

.If it be true that the Government of the United States is justified If it be true that the Government of the United States is justified in refusing to the leading productive interests of the country the insignificant sum proposed by this bill for the purpose of procuring information necessary for the protection of agriculture, if it were justified in refusing this small demand for that important interest, is it justified in so neglecting its own property interests that it would abandon without an investigation or an effort of resistance an immense region, a portion of this continent greater in extent than that already occupied and improved? I say, is it justifiable that through and for such reasons as these, from the fact that it would cost $6,000, the limit of the expense provided for in this bill, in view of such facts as these, will the Senate, to save the insignificant sum of $6,000, lose the opportunity, even the chance, of acquiring information which would be of such importance to the direct property interest of the Government itself, frespective of the question of its duty to do some-

The Schator from California says that if this is done we would necessarily be obligated to support legislation for the payment of bounty or to carry on this destruction of insects by the Government. Does it follow, because the Government of the United States expends millions in making surveys, building light-houses, and everything of that kind, for the benefit of commerce, that the General Government must itself carry on the business of commerce? By no means:

Some of our friends seem a little sensitive to the derision with which some of our friends seem a little sensitive to the derision with which this proposition was met. I heard before coming into the Senate, elsewhere, the suggestion that the discussion of a bill like this would give rise to some derisive comment. It was perhaps to be expected; but in a body composed as this is, of gentlemen having the knowledge which members of the Senate must possess, or should at least possess, derision of that kind cannot be expected to last long. I know my friend the Senate from California meant nothing sealous in the world. friend, the Senator from California, meant nothing serious in the way of an objection to the bill when he proposed an amendment to include the worm of the still.'

Mr. CONKLING. "The worm that never dies."
Mr. HARVEY. Yes; that is the worm that never dies; but it is not a worm particularly destructive to the agricultural interests. It is the urban element of population particularly that succumbs to the ravages of the worm of the still; but this bill is advanced in a different interest, and I think that the amendment is not germane to the object of the bill.

And now a word as to the amendment of my friend, the Senator from Illinois, who suggested that the matter be left entirely in the hands of the Commissioner of Agriculture, under the impression that he will make every inquiry necessary. Early in this session I introduced a bill providing for a temporary commission, to be appointed by the Commissioner of Agriculture and all the expenses incurred to be audited by him, so that the matter would be entirely under his direction; but before the time that the bill was considered in committee I happened to be in the Department of Agriculture, and in conversation with the Commissioner I ascertained that in relation to the particular insects that have been most discussed here, the Rocky Mountain locust, he had not acquired a very great deal of practical information concerning their habits as a destructive in-

Mr. LOGAN. I suppose if he had consulted Pharaoh he might have found out more about it than he does now.

Mr. HARVEY. His scientific description of the insect is no doubt accurate, and would guide us; but I discovered in conversation with the Commissioner that he was not aware of the fact that throughout the Commissioner that he was not aware of the fact that throughout the portion of the continent where the ravages of these insects prevail it is believed that they originate in the Rocky Mountains and fly in various directions into the rich and cultivated portions of the country, there laying eggs and producing young; and that in the course of the succeeding season the young locusts, as soon as they acquire strength and wings to fly, rise and fly back in the direction from which the original swarms came. The Commissioner of Agriculture, notwithstanding he had been in correspondence with different sections of the country and with some scientific gentlemen having that matter particularly in view, had yet never heard of this supposition. As I said before, the bill that I introduced had in view the placing of the whole matter under his control in such a way that he could direct and supervise the investigations altogether. Another bill was introduced which I thought was in some of its features preferable. I preferred the second bill and would now prefer it, because I think it makes a more liberal and adequate provision for the object which is in view; but hoping for harmony I agreed readily and heartily in support of the bill now before the Senate; and, inasmuch as it provides for all the most destructive insects, I think that it will meet a sufficient support in the Senate and make it assured that whatever information can be acquired with the small sum appropriated will be acquired in such a way that it can be properly used. Gentlemen, for instance the Senator from Illinois, talk about the effective way in which certain farmers operated against the Rocky Mountain locust. Their method is very practical, and they deserve commendation for it.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not say "effective." I did not know anything about its effectiveness

Mr. HARVEY. In many instances their efforts have been effective; but I say these very efforts would have been far more effective if there could have been any general system of attack practiced upon them. If commissioners such as are herein provided for or somebody else in the public interest, seeking information as to the most effective way of their destruction, had recommended and published throughout the country the most effective way of operating against them, there would have been uniform co-operation, and I think the effect would have been such as to have saved millions of dollars. I think that the effect of this appropriation of $6,000 would be the saving of many millions of dollars to this Government, and I hope the Senate will

Mr. WINDOM. I have been somewhat surprised at the manner of the opposition manifested to this bill, and also at the argument sug-gested by the two or three Senators who have spoken against it. Here is a pest sweeping over the country every year, destroying from thirty to fifty millions of property, and a bill is brought in by the Committee on Agriculture appropriating the small sum of $6,000 for the purpose of obtaining information as to the best mode of preventing these devastations, and gentlemen meet the proposition with ridicule, and seek to prevent this very slight response to the wish of the agricultural interests of the country by insisting that there is already a sufficient provision made for it. I do not deem myself the best judge as to whether sufficient provision has been made or not. The agriculturists of the country have largely petitioned Congress to take some steps in this matter. Those petitions have been referred to the Committee on Agriculture, who I have no doubt have carefully con-sidered the subject, and, so far as I know, have unanimously reported in favor of the proposition. The Commissioner of Agriculture, I assume, also has favored it; so that when all those parties, the farmers themselves, who are directly interested, and the committee appointed for the purpose of considering and representing their interests, have considered it and reported in favor of this bill, two or three of us assume here to ridicule a proposition of this kind, and say that there is no sort of necessity for it; and why? In one breath, because the field is so broad that one man can never do anything, if appointed; that he cannot extend his investigations over this vast territory, and that it will not amount to anything. Another argument in the very next breath is that we have already appointed and paid for by the Government, in the Agricultural Department, an officer who is amply able, who is competent in every respect to conduct this investigation, and why not let him do it? As both Senators who have most vigorously opposed this measure have said, "Why duplicate his duties?" Let us look at this duplication of duties for a single moment. Here is a clerk in the Agricultural Department under a pay, I believe, of $1,800 a year, or about that sum, who is expected, without any additional appropriation of money, to carry on his investigations over this wide extent of territory, and to recommend to the people of over this wide extent of territory, and to recommend to the people of this country the most successful methods for the destruction of these insects. The Senator from Illinois and the Senator from California insist that this is a sufficient appropriation to meet the demand of

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from Illineis did not say anything about the appropriation. If it was desired to make an appropriation for Professor Glover to continue his scientific examinations I presume no one would object to it, but the necessity of appointing an officer for the duplication of his duties was questioned, and that was

Mr. WINDOM. Ah! Then I understand the honorable Senator from Illinois to complain of the Committee on Agriculture because they proposed to favor somebody. The chairman of the Committee on Agriculture has distinctly announced that they have nobody in It now turns out that my honorable friend from Illinois has somebody in mind, and he desires an appropriation made for the special benefit of Mr. Glover. We, who desire to see this bill passed in the interest of the agriculturists of the country and for their protection, have nobody in mind. I believe Mr. Glover to be a thoroughly competent man, and I shall have no sort of fault to find if he is armed with the authority and clothed with the means necessary to carry on this investigation. There is no private end to be attained, as I understand it, by this committee, but only to meet the just demands so far as we can of the sufferers in the western part of the country.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question right there? I ask him why he is so desirous of having an officer appointed to perform this duty when one already exists? That is the point I make in reference to that matter. If the officer now existing has not sufficient money to carry on the duties, then appropriate more money; but why make a new officer, why make a new bureau? The Senator knows very well it will not be abolished. There never has been a bureau in this Government abolished after it was once estab-

Mr. WINDOM. I have no fears of making a new bureau by this bill. The same gentleman who is now performing the duty may be appointed if the proper authorities choose to appoint him. It simply gives a little more authority and provides what duty shall be performed. I think the committee have been very wise in the mode they have provided for securing the appointment of the man who is best qualified to perform this duty. I think that the terror mani-fested by my honorable friend from Illinois and also by my honorable friend from California as to the duplication of officers is entirely without foundation. I ask my honorable friend from California if he felt any of that terror when some years ago we appointed a com-missioner on mining statistics? We have had two or three of them. Some have reported, and I hold in my hand one of the large resome have reported, and I hold in my hand one of the large reports made by the Commissioner of Mining Statistics. I think my honorable friend was then a member of the House of Representatives, if not of the Senate, and I never heard any special alarm on account of any duplication of duties or any increase of officers who had been commissioned and traveling over the country in all the Territories long before that. We have had all these explorations going on over the Territories. Was he alarmed when we proposed to send Mr. Raymond, J. Ross Browne, and others, commissioners to examine into the mining interests of the country, for fear that we should inaugurate some new officers and create new bureaus?

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. WINDOM. Yes, sir.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. SARGENT. I am entirely opposed to appointing mining commissioners, and have said so over and over again in the Committee on Appropriations. The thing was created before I came back to Congress the last time, six years ago. I am opposed to it and have so stated on all occasions, and in favor of striking such officers from the As to the exploring expedition, it is there in the interests of the agriculturists.
Mr. WINDOM. But as to J. Ross Browne?

Mr. SARGENT.

That was when I was out of Congress.

Then my friend has not been quite as inconsistent Mr. WINDOM.

as I supposed; that is all.

Mr. SARGENT. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations the Senator ought to know that on a number of occasions I have stated that I consider the appointment of commissioners useless.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator makes so many valuable observations in the Committee on Appropriations and in the Senate that I am not expected to remember all he says.

Now a word as to the benefits that may be expected from this bill. The chairman of the Committee on Agriculture pointed them out to you very distinctly, I think, and I need not repeat them to you except in this: that one of the provisions of the bill is that this investigation is to be made "in order to devise successful methods for the destruction of such insects." I do not think that at present any of these exploring commissioners who have been traveling over the country are directed or authorized to make reports upon that subject, or that it is any part of their duty to suggest it. I want to say to my honorable friend from Illinois who has, I believe, distinguished himself as a commander of a large portion of our Army, if it is not important, if we are to combat an enemy whose destruction is wide-spread, that we should have some system, some organization, some head, somebody to whom all these men over the country that are combating the enemy may report and through whom they may be organized? Take my own State. In a single county in Minnesota last year there were over $25,000 paid for the destruction of these pests; and the reports say that they saved many times that amount of money by the persistent and the systematic efforts which they made for this There was one mode adopted there; another mode has been adopted in another State or Territory; and one of the objects of this bill is to recommend or to devise the most successful manner of doing it. Can this eighteen-hundred dollar clerk, who stays here, no matter what his ability may be, no matter how well he may be versed in all kinds of bug-ology and in every kind of insect lore, versed in all kinds of bug-ology and in every kind of insect fore, with $1,800 annual salary, travel over the country and ascertain what these men are doing, ascertain what by experience is the best mode of destroying these pests I think not. But the gentleman who will be appointed will be authorized to visit those places; will be authorized to examine the nature of these ravages; will be authorized to consult with the farmers. My friend from Illinois, in order to compliment the farmers, whom I think he is not complimenting by expected the property of by opposing this bill, says he would rather have the opinion of one old farmer as to the best method of doing it than that of scientific men. Then let us give to this officer the means and the opportunity the discrete first of the solution of the means and the opportunity to go out among those farmers who are battling year by year with this destructive pest; let him consult with them, and ascertain what is being done, and then let him report after full consultation and bring to bear all the scientific knowledge and experience he has as to which is the best mode of destroying them. As was said by the Senator from Kansas, from thirty to fifty millions a year are being destroyed, and we propose here simply to send out and inquire if there is no way in which we can arrest this pest which has swept like a tornado over a territory larger than all New England. The Senator from Illinois and the Senator from California say no. I say in response to the demands of the farmers who have petitioned, and relying on the best judgment of the committee who have investigated and whose duty it is to investigate and understand this question, I want to make the experiment and see if something cannot be done.

Mr. MORTON. This proposition is to make an appropriation for the advancement of science. If there is a reasonable prospect that by scientific investigations this grasshopper plague can be abated or to any extent ameliorated, I think it is worthy the attention of Congress and entirely within the purview of its powers. It is not more gress and entrery within the purview of its powers. It is not more than two years since we made an appropriation to send commissioners to different parts of the globe to observe the transit of Venus. That was for scientific purposes and for abstract science. If it was competent for Congress to do that, it is certainly competent for Congress to do this, and the reason is very strong in this case. States have been devastated; hundreds and thousands of people have been left without food and support. There has been great suffering to the congress to the congress of the co have been devastated; hundreds and thousands of people have been left without food and support. There has been great suffering; contributions have been taken up in different parts of the United States to supply the necessities of these people. Now if by the appointment of a special commissioner to investigate the nature and character of this pestilence there is any prospect of either abating or ameliorating it, and I am told there is, I think we ought to make the appropriation without hesitation. without hesitation.

My friend from California said that this principle would involve appropriations to confine the Mississippi River to its channel. If there was a reasonable prospect that by some scientific discovery or by some progress in science the Mississippi could be confined to its channel and the overflow of that valley prevented, I think a com-mission could not be appointed too quick. If, to use his own illustramission could not be appointed too quick. If, to use his own intestra-tion, there is any prospect that by the advancement of science we can bring rain to the arid plains of the West, and supply them with water, and make them fertile—if there be such a prospect, then a scientific commission ought to be appointed without delay. As there is no rea-sonable prospect of any scientific discovery confining the Mississippi to its banks or bringing rain to the plains of the far West, I think the arguments are not in point. But as there is a prospect of doing something to ameliorate the terrible loss which has been inflicted by the grasshoppers, I think the appropriation ought to be made. I shall vote for it very cheerfully.

The suggestion occurred to me while the Senator from Illinois was speaking that it may be that this commission ought to be put under the control of the entomological bureau of the Department of Agriculture. It may be that the professor of entomology there should have the control and direction of this matter. I think there is something in that. To make it an independent commission perhaps would not be the wisest thing to be done; but we ought to make a special appropriation, and authorize that bureau in the Agricultural Department to prosecute these investigations, the chief of it having power to appoint assistants and to go himself.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, Senators whose States have not been devastated by these insects cannot feel the importance of this bill so much as those whose States have thus been devastated. In the State in which I live, and which I have the honor in part to represent, the whole of the northern part of Texas a few years ago was devastated and the entire crop swept off by grasshoppers. Throughout the State every autumn we lose millions of dollars by the cotton-worm. What is true there is true throughout all the cotton-growing States. The States have used all their exertions to ascertain some mode of destroying the boll-worm and various other cotton-worms that destroy that crop.

It is said that the entomologist connected with the Agricultural Department should have charge of all this. I would ask how a man who works in an office, who has no knowledge of these insects save what he sees by having dead insects sent to him along with such an account as may be furnished of them, can give to the world that information which the man can give who goes and examines the insects in the act of destroying crops and who notices their habits? It is an impossibility. An engineer working in the office is essential there: but an engineer on the field is equally essential. Let the professor who has charge of the entomological bureau of the Agricultural Department go on and do his work as he is doing it daily; but put a man in the field also.

Mr. SARGENT. I will merely say that the law as I cited it gives the Commissioner of Agriculture power to have persons correspond with him who do observe these things in the field. Mr. MAXEY. Put a man in a field and let that man work there. It is said that the head of the bureau gets letters and information from all parts of the country and that he can collate this information and thus furnish to the community that which they need. Does not anybody know that when you get talking with the farmers to whom the Senator from Illinois refers and who have a vast amount of most valuable experience and most valuable observation, you will get more out of one of them than when you put him down to writing a letter. He cannot write a letter containing all that an intelligent man could He cannot write a letter containing all that an intelligent man could get from him by actual conversation and intercourse with him. I want some intelligent man who understands the science of entomology to go out among these farmers and gather from them the information which is sought. I want him to be in a position where he can examine the operations of these pestiferous insects. I want him to go where he can have actual knowledge of the destruction occasioned to the agricultural community by these insects.

Is the United States interested in this question? Why, sir, at this time any one acquainted with agricultural affairs knows that the chinch-bug is doing immense destruction in the wheat-crop. As I stated a moment ago, the whole wheat-crop of Northern Texas was swept off a few years ago. Last year, not having the grasshoppers among us, we shipped a million and a half bushels of wheat, for which we got a million and a half of dollars. That is that much saved. The United States is directly interested in exportations, and every dollar of agricultural products that we can export to foreign countries adds that much to the wealth of the country. If we can discover some means of destruction to the cotton-worm, it will save to you millions of dollars. It is true of the chinch-bug, and it is true of this terrible pest, the grasshopper. Believing as I do that the small amount asked to be appropriated will be well expended, and representing as I do an agricultural community which rarely comes into Congress for any help, I do think that when this little pittance is asked in order to fall upon some process whereby the agricultural interests may be protected and advanced it does not look well to attempt to stop it.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, it has been the pleasure and the judgment of Congress to appropriate money and create commissioners of one sort and another to observe the movements of heavenly bodies, notably the study of the transit of Venus; to discover a polar sea; to study currents of the air and currents of water; to examine, explore, and discover mines; to breed fish, to propagate shad; to examine the habits of the people touching the swallowing of alcoholic drinks; and to do a great variety of other things supposed by the law-making power to concern the public interests. Some time ago it became painfully evident not only in Nebraska and Kansas but elsewhere that grasshoppers and locusts—the locusts of Egypt which according to Holy Writ were in ancient times so malignant in their visitations—took their rise in clouds on the table-lands of Mexico and by currents of air were brought nearer us and spread far and wide over agricultural portions of the country, leaving total devastation behind them. The committee of this body appropriately charged with such subjects has commended to us a bill proposing to so treat this subject that it shall not be everybody's business and nobody's business, but that an investigation of this great scourge, of this not merely sporadic but repeated and apparently continuing calamity, in its causes, in its remedy if there be one, in the precautions which may be employed to guard against it, may be brought to the knowledge and utility of those concerned.

The honorable Senator from California proposed an amendment which I do not think is appropriately the object of criticism, because it was undoubtedly a piece of wit and I think rather a rare piece of wit. It is said that

A little nonsense now and then Is relished by the best of men.

I am afraid it is true that even grave Senators do enjoy once in a while having the proceedings diversified a little by a thing so harmless as that. Therefore I have no censorious criticisms to make upon it, nor do I sympathize with Senators who think that this bill has encountered derision. It has been treated with a little playfulness, and I think it can afford to be so treated. I agree with very much that has been said on both sides, and agreeing to so much I see my way quite clear as matter of power and legitimate legislative province to vote for the bill. I shall vote for it without being able to bring any certainty to my mind that it may result in large utility, but feeling quite clear that it is an effort by appropriate means in the right

This commissioner to be appointed is to be able to draw to himself all the information to which my honorable friend from Illinois has so appropriately alluded. Everything gathered by the entomologists to whom he has alluded will be material and opportunity for this man. He, engaged in a specialty, in the doing of a single thing, will be set to try what he can do. John Randolph once said, "Beware of a man who reads but one book," thereby meaning, beware of a man who is devoted to one single thing because he probably will beat you upon that thing if you encounter him; he is quite likely to understand it, if it is the one idea which he pursues. This man who is intended to be selected for his fitness and qualification is to devote himself to this single thing, not to study at large all the information that pertains to insects, not to be an entomologist, not to rove at large over all that field of science, if it be a field of science, and I think it is, but to find out a practical way to this one single thing, how the agriculturists in that portion of the country thus visited may, if it is possible, defend themselves against a repetition of this scourge. No member of this body will laugh at the object; no member of this body will disapprove of any well-directed effort in respect of it, and the whole question is whether we shall appropriate a small sum of money for such a purpose. It is small as it stands in the bill; and although I have no right to say it, I presume the Senator who reports the bill, if it be the judgment of the Senate that a less sum will be sufficient, will acquiesce as readily as any other Senator in a reduction of the amount. Be it reduced or be it as it stands, it is the devotion of a small sum of money to the possibility at least, I think to the probability, of acquiring information the value of which no man can measure if it can be gained. Therefore, if I consider it upon its positive merits, or if I contrast it with various devotions of money which have been made since I have had the honor of directions. If it results in something, it will be emphatically bread cast upon the waters which will return again with great interest and great benefit.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I certainly owe an apology to the Senate for offering any further suggestion in reference to this bill, but we are so apt to criticise the motives of one another here that I think probably I owe it to myself to give another reason why I think the bill should not pass.

My friend from Minnesota, who is always very pleasant, says that my friend from California and myself are antagonizing the farming interest of this country. I do not so understand it. If I were a candidate for any particular office, I might be accused of having a motive if I were trying to make friends of the farmers. I have always been their friend and expect to be. When I see a thing asked for that is reasonable, I expect to vote for it the same as I do for a reasonable thing asked by anybody else. I have no idea of antagonizing any interest when I oppose the bill. I oppose it because I think the bill is wrong.

Let me make one suggestion to Senators in favor of this bill, and see whether or not my proposition is a reasonable one. Here you propose that a commissioner shall be appointed by the President, to be confirmed by the Senate; that he shall investigate what? The Rocky Mountain locust, the chinch-bug, the army-worm, the Hessian fly, the potato-bug, and other insects injurious to the great staples, wheat, corn, &c., and that he shall hold his office for the term of one year. That is the proposition. I should like to ask the question of some of the intelligent Senators who advocate this bill: Suppose the locust does not appear next year; how are you to investigate him? Suppose the chinch-bug does not appear next year; what is your investigation worth? I do not know. I presume if you sent this bill to the other end of the building you could get it investigated without any trouble, [laughter;] and perhaps on as scientific principles as you will have it investigated when you pass your bill.

I said about this bill that it was only a proposition to establish an office that would exist as long as the Government existed. I said that, and I believe it. If you intend to have an investigation that amounts to anything your bills not worth a cent. It is not usual

I said about this bill that it was only a proposition to establish an office that would exist as long as the Government existed. I said that, and I believe it. If you intend to have an investigation that amounts to anything, your bill is not worth a cent. It is not usual that the army-worm, and the chinch-bug, and the Hessian fly, and the locust all appear in one year. Have you ever known the time that they all did appear in one season? Then you are to investigate the habits of all these insects, their destructive qualities, and recommend to Congress some law that will prohibit their making attacks on wheat and corn hereafter. I suppose you might as well pass a penal statute and put them in the penitentiary or do something of that kind when you catch them. That is about what it amounts to. Perhaps your law will provide as they did in old times in the West when wolves were very bad in the country. The Legislatures used to pass a law giving fifty cents premium for a wolf's scalp. You had better pay something here as a premium for locust scalps and chinch-bug scalps, because if you do it all in one year you must do it in some way that you will work very rapidly. This bill means to provide a place for some person, and that is all it does mean. It means nothing more; it means nothing less than to provide a place for some person at $4,000 a year? If the Senators are in earnest about it, and I find that my friend from Texas, my friend from Indiana, my friend from New York, and some more friends in the Senate advocate it who are all good men, and each and every one expects to be President, if not the next time, at some other time, [laughter,] and therefore they are all in favor of the agricultural interest—now, would it not be well to provide in this some other time, [laughter,] and therefore they are all in favor of the agricultural interest—now, would it not be well to provide in this some other time, [laughter,] and therefore they are all in favor of the agricultural interest—now, would it not be well to provide in

My proposition is to leave this where the statute leaves it: to allow the Agricultural Department to have the investigations made by scientific men; and, if my friends are in earnest, let them agree to my amendment. They talk about the appropriation; they say it is a mere pittance. Well, if it is a mere pittance, make the appropriation and leave the officer out; let the Agricultural Department use the appropriation for the employment of such men as can investigate this thing, without making a special bureau and establishing a salary for it. Cannot that be done? Is not that reasonable? If one man cannot do it, perhaps two can; if two cannot do it, perhaps three can; they can be employed for much less money than you appropriate here as salary, for they have been employed for less.

So far as the investigation is concerned, I have made no opposition to it, and I do not propose to do so; but my opposition is to the mode and manner of making the investigation. Senators perhaps are not in the habit of reading the Bible very much. We might get some information on the subject of locusts if we examined the history of Egypt and the difficulties under which Pharaoh suffered. We might get some information there that would not be very valuable; for I believe they did not find any way there to destroy their locusts. You will never find any way under this bill to do it; it is impossible. You may devise all the plans that human ingenuity can suggest, and you cannot do it. We have tried for years, for centuries; but if there can be any plan devised, so as to make them less injurious to the interest of the people, let it be done; I have no objection to it; but let it be done in the mode and manner in which it has been done heretofore through this Department, without making a separate bureau.

I asked a while ago if there is any Senator on this floor who can show me where you have ever commenced by appointing an officer to do a certain thing connected with a Department that that has not become a bureau? You never abolish an office. That is what this means; it means nothing else. My opposition is not to the investigation, but it is to the making of a separate bureau for this purpose, which shall be continued whether the locust or the chinch-bug exists or not; there will always be enough for it to do, and it will come to Congress every year asking you to appropriate salary. Putting in "one year" means nothing. It is only the entering-wedge for this bureau and for this officer; for next year you will have a report that the time will have to be extended; that he has not had time enough to make this scientific investigation; he therefore desires the time to be extended; and the next appropriation bill will extend it again and again. Then it will be a separate bureau, with clerks employed and scientific men engaged. That is what it means. My amendment means this, to come in just before the word "investigate," that the Agricultural Department shall investigate and gather information on these subjects, and leave our appropriation, or such part as the Senate think proper; let that stand, and strike out of the bill all in reference to the appointment of a commissioner. That is my proposition, and that is what I have argued, and that is what I am in favor of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I understand now that the amendment does not propose to waive the appropriation. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois is to continue the appropriation of 86,000, his objection being to having a commissioner appointed.

Mr.LOGAN. No. Isay whateveramount the Senate thinks is proper.
I do not propose $6,000. I have no objection to appropriating the amount which is necessary; but I do not think that much is neces-

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Any amount that is necessary. The amendment does not touch the appropriation; therefore it lets the $6,000 stand. The committee which reported this bill probably acted with a little intelligence, and after having obtained some information, and it acted unanimously. It was perfectly apparent to us that the Commissioner of Agriculture and his assistant, the entomologist there, have all that they can do. They have not touched this great evil; they cannot by possibility attend to the duties which they are to perform here in the Department and accomplish what this commissioner is intended to attain; and, besides that, it is proposed that this commissioner shall be a man of a very different character from even the person who is employed in the Department. It so happens that the scientific men of this country have this subject under their advisement and investigation. They came before the Committee on Agriculture; one of them was Professor Riley, the other was Professor Lecount, of Philadelphia. They came before the Agricultural Committee of the House and of the Senate and made their statements. One object of our introducing the provision that this commissioner should be selected by the secretary of the Smithsonian Institution was to connect him with the scientific investigations which are going on; and I will say to the Senate that my belief is that, by the appointment of this one commissioner, a scientific man, he will gather to himself the result of all the investigations which have been made by the scientific institutions in the different States where they have had commissions, and will communicate it to every part of this country; while, if it is confined to the investigations which have been going on year after year in the Agricultural Department, we shall get the result of their information, without their having visited the fields, in the next agricultural report which will be published, I suppose, two or three years after it is written. This commissioner, too, will gather, as it is suggested by my friend from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] all the information which has been gathered in other countries. So by this little appropriation of $6,000 we shall be gathering together and regressing all the information which has been gathering together and aggregating all the information which has been got by these various scientific institutions, and this commissioner will have their aid.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? because I know he has investigated the subject. Do not the Agricultural Department and the Smithsonian Institution get all these scientific examinations from foreign countries now under a provision of exchange which they make? Do they not have them?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. They get information from other countries, but they do not make it a point at the present time to gather all the particular information that there is on this one pressing subject in this exigency. They have a thousand other things to attend to. This subject is worthy the full and constant attention of one scientific man. The people of this country so believe, and I do not think that there could be a more economical expenditure, because we do thus secure all the investigation of science, and at once enlist these academies and institutes in this important subject.

I hope the bill will be passed as it has been amended, providing that the officer shall be appointed by the President on the confirmation of the Senate. As to the idea that this bill is meant to establish a bureau; that it means nothing else, as the Senator from Illinois so often repeats, it is not correct. I say it means no such thing, and by its very terms it excludes the idea that it means any such thing. It expressly provides that this commission shall terminate at the end of a year; and if the commissioner dies, or there is a vacancy, only the residue of that year shall be filled.

I will ask the Senator if he does not know from his Mr. LOGAN. examination that there is not a man in the Unived States who can make this investigation in a year? Does he not know that?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I cannot meet the argument of the Senator from Illinois, because it is, first, that there is nothing to do, the Commissioner of Agriculture and his aids are sufficient, and, in the next place, it is so gigantic a subject that it is an act of folly to attempt to do anything with it. I cannot meet both arguments. I do undertake to say that an intelligent scientific man, having the aid of the scientific institutions of the country, going to visit these fields, gathering information from the States of Illinois and Minnesota, can accumulate a great amount of information and communicate it to the world. That he can accomplish.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is a little unfair in his statement in reference to my argument. It is of course natural; we cannot help these things.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is not natural to me to be unfair.

Mr. LOGAN. I say it is natural. The point was not that there is so much work that it cannot be done. I made no such argument. I so much work that it cannot be done. so much work that it eannot be done. I made no such arguments. I said that they had a man performing this duty in the Agricultural Department now. I said he got his information from the entomologists of the different States. I said he got it from farmers and from others and collated and collected the information. I said that we had scientific men on the plains in connection with our scientific surveys examining this question now and getting information. I did say that no one man could collect all this information in a year; I say so now; but I put it on the ground that the man at the Department was collecting this information from all over the country by persons sending it to him. The Senator takes the ground that this man must travel around in one year to make these experiments and make his recommendation. I say that no one man can do it in a year if he is to make all these examinations and travel all over the country to investigate these different insects. So I am not inconsistent in the argument I have made. It shows that when the bill says it shall terminate in a year, that is not the meaning of it. That was the point I was argning.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not know that any one Senator can stand up and say that a bill does not mean what the Senate votes that it does mean. If the bill says it is to terminate at the end of a continuous authority to say that it is meant to be year, no one Senator has any authority to say that it is meant to be a perpetual institution.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him? I should like to ask the Senator if he has any objection to this bill going over until to-morrow, so that we may have an opportunity to examine the petitions which have been laid on the table of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Agriculture. My impression is—I do not speak confidently, and it is quite likely I may be wrong, because I only heard casually the presentation of the petitions—my impression is that the relief asked is very different from that proposed by this bill; that they do not ask a commission, but that they do ask the United States to engage in the business of destroying these insects. If that is so, this is not the bill they want; and if it is so, it re-enforces the argument which has been made against the bill in this form. If the farmers of the West, whom I know to be intelligent—I give them all credit for that—really ask for this bill, it would have very much to do with my vote, because if they think they have not got the information I am willing that the information shall be furnished at this cost or even more than this cost.

One other suggestion, if the Senator will allow me. Yesterday the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Morton] gave notice to the Senate that to-day he would ask the Senate to remain here until the Pinchback case was disposed of. This debate has run on over an hour and a half since the close of the morning hour, and I must say that for one I am since the close of the morning hour, and I must say that for one I am not disposed, at the end of four or five hours' debate on this proposition, to sit late to-night in order to dispose of the Louisiana question.

Mr. FRELINGHUŸSEN. If my friend's interruption is through, I will simply say that I trust the Senate will take a vote upon this bill. If they do not approve it, let them vote it down; if they do approve it, let them pass it. I trust it will not be postponed until to-morrow for the purpose of looking at these petitions. I do not remember all the petitions contained. If they contain an application for a bounty, nobody would vote for it. If they do not contain an application for a bounty, we certainly can give them this little appropriation instead of the extended bounties which my friend seems to think they ask for. I think the Senate may be now ready for a vote, and I will not

I think the Senate may be now ready for a vote, and I will not longer detain them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. Logan,] which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposition is to amend the bill so that if amended it will read:

That it shall be the duty of the Agricultural Department to investigate and gather information relative to those insects which are most destructive to the crops of farmers and planters, and especially of the Rocky Mountain locust, the chinch-bug, the army-worm, the cotton-worm, the tobacco-worm, the Hessian fly, the potato-bug, and other insects injurious to the great staples, wheat, corn, and cotton, in order to devise successful methods for the destruction of such insects, and to make public from time to time such information and such practical instructions for the suppression of the different insects referred to.

Mr. LOGAN. I will change the word "Department" and make it read, "that it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture." I believe it is not designated as a department in the law The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modi-

Mr. DAVIS. The portion of the bill struck out by the amendment of the Senator from Illinois includes a part to which I wish to make an amendment; and I believe it is in order first to perfect the text an amendment; and I believe it is in order first to perfect the text before the vote is taken on striking out. We all agree that the information sought should be gathered from some source. I believe that is admitted by the Senator from Illinois. It is a well known fact that more than one-half of the people of this country are engaged in agriculture, and that the other half live on that half. I think they are entitled to some consideration. The manner in which the information should be gotten is the only question. I think the salary of $4,000 is too large. I therefore move to strike out "four" in the second section and insert "three," which will make the salary of the officer $3,000. I wish that done before the amendment of the Senator from Illinois is voted on.

Mr. MORTON. I believe the regular order was only passed over informally with the right to call it up at any time.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think we can vote very soon on this bill.

bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I think we are done talking. Mr. MORTON. If the vote can be taken without further debate, I shall not interpose; otherwise I shall feel constrained to call for the shall not interpose; otherwise I shall reel constrained to call for regular order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator from Indiana intend to press the Louisiana question to a decision to-day?

Mr. MORTON. I cannot say that now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. Davis.]

Mr. LOGAN. I would suggest to the Senator that if my amendment is adopted that is entirely unnecessary, for the reason that my amendment will strike out the section that appoints the commissioner.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand that very well, but I wish to perfect the text. I want to have a test of the view of the Senate whether it will make the salary $3,000. It may make some difference in my vote. Mr. LOGAN. The test is whether we shall have this commissioner

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. Davis.]

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. Logan.]
Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORTON. Does that leave the appropriation?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No; the appropriation is out. It destroys the bill entirely.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted-yeas 29, nays 28; as follows;

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Booth, Cockrell, Cooper, Eaton, English, Ferry, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, Key, Logan, McCreery, McDonald, Merrimon, Morrillof Vermont, Norwood, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Brace, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wiscoonsin, Christianey, Conkling, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Frelinghnysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, McMillan, Maxey, Mitchell, Morton, Paddock, Patterson, Robertson, West, Windom, and Wright—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boutwell, Burnside, Caperton, Clayton, Conover, Davis, Dawes, Jones of Nevada, Morrill of Maine, Oglesby, Randolph, Ransom, Sharon, Thurman, and Wadleigh—16.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment reported by the committee as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would like to hear the bill read at length on its third reading.

The bill was read the third time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to investigate and gather information relative to those insects which are most destructive to the crops of planters and farmers, and especially of the Rocky Mountain locust, the chinch-bug, the army-worm, the cotton-worm, the tobacco-worm, the Hessian fly, potato-bug, and other insects injurious to the great staples, wheat, corn, and cotton, in order to devise successful methods for the destruction of such insects; and to make public from time to time such information and such practical instructions for the suppression of the different insects referred to.

The bill was passed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 438) for the protection of agriculture against injurious insects was passed.

PORT OF GENESEE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is the resolution of the Senator from Indiana, relative to the admission of P. B.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope that neither the Senator from Indiana

nor any other Senator will object now if I ask that the bill which was considered the other morning, and to which the Senator from Ohio on more recent information will not interpose further objection, be taken up that the Senate may vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?
Mr. EDMUNDS. Subject to a call for the regular order.
Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2282) to extend to the port of Genesee, in the State of New York, the privileges of sections 2990 to 2997 of the Revised Statutes, inclusive.

Mr. CONKLING. The bill was read the other day and discussed at some length, as I think the Senator from Vermont will remember. It employs and involves the appointment of no officer and the creation of no additional expense, but is simply to make this port, for reasons which the committee thought were abundant, one of the ports to which the regulations here referred to apply. As a matter of time, I hope the Senator from Vermont will not have it read, unless he really wants to know what its particulars are.

to know what its particulars are.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not ask that it be read. I only wish to say Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not ask that it be read. I only wish to say that I believe the system which has already been adopted, and which embraces the names of a good many places that ought never to have been embraced, is a vicious one, and, if carried out step by step, as this bill proposes to do, it will finally result in breaking it down, as I-think it ought to do; for you cannot collect the revenue fairly and impartially in the way that these steps propose. At the same time, I am bound to say that I do not know any reason in the world why the city of Rochester and the collection district of Genesee should not be much more clearly entitled to these special benefits than a great many much more clearly entitled to these special benefits than a great many other districts that already are entitled to them; so that, while I make no special opposition to this bill, I feel bound to put in a protest against the system which is thus being extended from one town and place to another.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read

the third time, and passed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. BOGY, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Sarah E. Ballantine, widow of David Ballantine, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the bill (S. No. 229) to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, be recommitted to the Committee on Territories for the purpose of making some amendments which are deemed desirable.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HITCHCOCK subsequently reported the bill with amendments.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. MORTON on the 5th March, 1875:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback be admitted as a Senator from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years beginning the 4th day of March, 1873.

The pending question being on the amendment of Mr. EDMUNDS to insert the word "not" before the word "admitted."

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, I suppose it is well understood that my opposition to the admission of Mr. Pinchback is not an objection of color; and especially as coming from the State of Louisiana, a majority of whose people are colored, I see no possible objection to be raised on that ground. The only objection I have ever made or that I now make to the admission of Mr. Pinchback is that I do not think he was legally elected.

Mr. President, I do not intend to go into all the merits of the question of Mr. Pinchback's election. These have been argued and reargued and discussed until little or nothing further can be said without mere repetition of what has already been said by some Senator in the course of the debates, at the last session and the present. I expressed my own views upon the main questions involved last March, to which I still adhere, and which I do not propose to repeat at length.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. Thurman] has again very fairly and impartially discussed the whole merits of the case at the present session. And the Senator from Vermont again on Friday last, with great ability and clearness, discussed the case in all its essential legal aspects, in whose argument I entirely concur. And I had intended to confine my remarks to the single point of the recognition by the Senate of the validity of the Kellogg government in Louisiana, now insisted upon by the Senators from Mississippi, Indiana, and New Jersey. But before coming to this point I will briefly notice some points made by the Senator from Indiana and by the Senator from New Jersey on Friday last.

The Senator from Indiana, for the purpose of showing that the certificate of Governor Kellogg to the election of Pinchback made a prima facie case for Pinchback, and that he should be admitted to his seat and his right contested afterward, cited the case of the credentials of a Senator from Alabama and those of a Senator from Rhode Island, where the governors of those States respectively, whose election and title to office were admitted and about which there was no dispute, had signed the credentials. And to bring the Pinchback credespite, had signed the credentials. And to bring the Friedback credentials, signed by Kellogg, within these precedents he relied and proceeded, as I understood him, entirely upon an asserted admission of the Senator from Vermont that Kellogg was governor of Louisiana. Now the only admission of the Senator from Vermont, as I understood him, was simply an admission that Kellogg was acting as such governor and in the actual exercise of the powers of the office, without reference to, and without any admission of, his actual election or his legal title to act as such. To bring Pinchback's case within the precedents cited by the Senator from Indiana, the admission of the Senator from Indiana, the Indiana, the Indiana from Indi ator from Vermont could give him no aid, unless that admission went to the extent that Kellogg was the legally-elected governor; whereas we all know that has always been denied by the Senator from Vermont and every other Senator who has opposed the admission of Pinchback, the election of governor and that of the Legislature stand-ing upon the same ground; while none have denied that Kellogg was in the possession and exercise of the powers of governor, and while, at the same time, they have insisted that he had been wrongfully placed and kept in power.

I now call upon the Senator from Vermont to state whether in his speech on Friday he made or intended to make any admission that Kellogg was rightly or legally the governor of Louisiana when he signed the credentials of Mr. Pinchback.

Kellogg was rightly or legally the governor of Louisiana when he signed the credentials of Mr. Pinchback.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator wishes me to answer, I can say that I am certain that I did not make any such admission or state any such thing. What I intended to say and did say, as I think the RECORD will show, (which, so far as my humble speeches go, is never corrected for publication; but what I say goes, with whatever evils it may possess, to the Senators exactly as stated in the Chamber.) that Governor Kellogg was, as I stated over and over again, and as the Senator from Michigan has stated, acting as the executive of that State, and he was protected in that position by the President of the United States, as I have said often, as I thought he ought to have been, because there must be somebody to preserve order in the state of chaos into which that State had fallen. The President took what he could find. But I have never said, and never shall say until I change my opinion, that Mr. Kellogg was lawfully elected the governor of the State of Louisiana, and was lawfully entitled under the constitution of that State, as of right, to exercise any function at all.

Mr. MORTON. May I interrupt the Senator from Michigan a moment? In my brief reply to the Senator from Vermont I commented upon the fact that according to my understanding of his speech—and I thought I listened to him carefully—he did not call in question the executive character of Kellogg. I commented upon that immediately afterward; and, if I misapprehended the Senator from Vermont, I would have expected him to correct me then; but he did not do so.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The Senator from Vermont did not happen to be in the Chamber.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am hearing what the Senator from Indiana is to be in the Chamber.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am hearing what the Senator from Indiana is saying.

Mr. MORTON. That is all I have to say.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was not in during all the time that the Senator from Indiana spoke. I was obliged to go out for a few moments and from Indiana spoke. I was obliged to go out for a few moments and do not know what he said then; but I am sure I need not have risen to tell the Senator from Indiana what I have so often stated to the Senate, that in my belief, from the testimony reported by his own committee, Mr. Kellogg was not the lawful governor of that State. It was for that reason that I was in favor of the bill that was reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections to provide a new election in that State; that so far as we could ascertain from the facts there was no means of knowing or helieving that either of the candition in that State; that so far as we could ascertain from the facts there was no means of knowing or believing that either of the candidates was the lawful governor: Kellogg, because he did not get votes enough; the other man, because the votes that he did get were in violation of every principle of republican government, by fraud and violence and wrong of every character; and therefore for my honorable friend from Indiana to imagine that, because I said that I did admit, as I do now, that Kellogg was acting as the governor of that State, and, therefore, in the sense of present power in position, I conceded thereby that he was the rightful governor of that State and holding de jure an executive capacity, surpasses my comprehension. The Senator must have been greatly amazed at what I said if he understood me to say, as I certainly did not say, if he understood me to mean that I conceded that Mr. Kellogg was the de jure governor of

Mr. MORTON. Here is what the Senator said: Suppose that Governor Kellogg, as I shall call him for convenience

Mr. EDMUNDS. Exactly; "for convenience." Mr. MORTON.

and governor in fact he was and is-

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. MORTON.

had chosen to certify the credentials of the gentleman elected by what was called the McEncry legislature, should we not all have said that we knew that that body of men was not the Legislature of the State of Louisiana?

That I believe was the Senator's reference. I do not find anywhere in his argument that he intended to impair the evidence of the credentials by denying that Kellogg was governor of Louisiana. If he did, I do not remember it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My honorable friend surprises me after what he now says still more than he did before. He has quoted me correctly, although I made some further observations on the subject; but they although I made some further observations on the subject; but they are of the same character. I regard that as a fair quotation from what I said; and knowing the accuracy of our reporters, it is undoubtedly literally what I said, because, as I say, the few speeches I deliver here are not doctored. That being the state of the case, the Senator will read there what I said. I called him governor "for convenience;" and then I said he is governor "in fact." What is a governor in fact? It is a man, whether by right or by wrong, who is exercising executive functions in a State. We all agree that he is, and is still. If he had gone in with an army of his own instead of and is still. If he had gone in with an army of his own instead of with the Army of the United States and set up his authority there, he would have been governor in fact exactly as I described him to be.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. So, Mr. President, sinks the foundation upon which the Senator from Indiana had erected a somewhat ostentatious structure; and so sinks that structure also.

Mr. MORTON. I do not want to interrupt my friend further; but the position stands undenied yet that the title of Pinchback, I think, is nowhere attacked in the argument of the Senator from Vermont because of any imperfection growing out of the fact that Kellogg was not the governor of Louisiana. So the foundation has not sunk. Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The Senator will have an opportunity after get through.

The Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. Frelinghuysen,] in speaking of the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections so often referred to, spoke of their conclusion, that neither Kellogg with his legislature nor McEnery with his was elected, as absurd; because, as he argues, if the one was not elected the other must have been. Now, he argues, if the one was not elected the other must have been. Now, I have so much confidence in both the integrity and the legal ability of the Senator from New Jersey that, whether I can succeed in now making him see his error or not, I am satisfied that, in the language of Lord Coke, "At some other time and in some other place," when the excitement of the present contest is over, he will discover that there is no such absurdity as he now supposes in the conclusion of the committee that neither the candidates on the one side nor the other were properly elected; and that his own conclusion, that, if one set were not elected, the other must have been, will strike his own mind as a most glaring and transparent non sequitur.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If my friend will permit me, as he does me the honor of directing attention to what I said, my position was not that it was absurd that Kellogg and his legislature, or McEnery and his legislature, was not elected; it was that it was an absurd conclusion to say, when on the 4th of November, 1872, two men were running for governor, that neither one of the two was elected, and that there was no tie. I said nothing about the election of a legislature.

there was no tie. I said nothing about the election of a legislature.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I think perhaps the Senator is right; but it does not alter the argument at all, because no man ever has pointed out any difference and no man has ever discriminated between the ont any difference and no man has ever discriminated between the question as it relates to the governor and as it relates to the Legislature. They were elected at the same election or neither was elected at all. The admission the Senator now makes as to the governor therefore does not necessitate the altering of a single word in my argument. Does he mean to say that the frauds committed on both sides in the election, in the mode of ascertaining and counting, or estimating the votes, in the intimidation on one or both sides, and the plots and counterplots of both could not possibly be so excessive and so general as to make it impossible to hold that the candidates on either side were ally elected? either side were duly elected?

Is there any absurdity in holding, when the evidence justifies the conclusion, that the frands of each have been so glaring and so general that neither the one side nor the other has been legally elected; when the proceedings, as a whole, upon both sides have been void for those frands, that the whole election as to both is void? And certainly the will find the result of the state of the stat tainly if the wildest imagination can conceive such a case, he will find that this is one of those cases, and that his unaided imagination lags far behind the perfect nightmare of fraud on both sides exhibited by the cold, naked facts of this case. And if he will examine the facts of this case as reported by the committee he will find it a harder question than he ever yet undertook to decide, which had succeeded in perpetrating the greatest mass of fraud, or to strike the balance between these

There may have been more of intimidation on the side of the McEn-There may have been more of intimidation on the side of the McEnery party, and the Kellogg party may have been provoked to meet this and the frauds of the McEnery party by counterfrauds; and, if so, they certainly cannot be said to have failed in the effort. It was, on the other hand, a most signal—and, with the aid of Judge Durell and the military, became a most triumphant—success. The returning or canvassing board, under whose canvass the Kellogg party claim to have been elected, having no returns before them and supposed copies of but a part, estimated the majorities which in their opinion the various precincts ought to have given, and adopted the result as if that vote had been actually given; and when this plan was supposed to be open to question, as well it might be, they proceeded upon affidavits known by the canvassers themselves to be fictitious and fraudulent, got up by thousands in the custom-house or elsewhere, without any real claim to authenticity or to reality even, but supposed to be justifiable to meet the frauds of the other side. The opinion of the Senator from New Jersey seems to be based upon the number of colored and white voters registered, and assumes that all the colored voters would have voted the Kellogg ticket, but, owing to intimidation, that some of them did not.

Such, and such only, is the kind of evidence upon which the Senator from New Jersey ventures the assertion that he believes Kellogg and his Legislature were elected. From the very nature of the case and his own explanation, this can mean nothing more than that he thinks, if there had been no fraud or intimidation, they would have been cleeted. But, unfortunately for his argument, the law has not adopted his opinion, nor that of any other man, of what the result would have been without fraud or intimidation, as the test of the election, but been without fraud or intimidation, as the test of the election, but the actual count of the votes actually given.

But the Senator from New Jersey, like the Senators from Mississippi and Indiana, again insists upon Pinchback's prima facie right to a seat, subject to be expelled upon investigation into the facts. This has been repeatedly urged before, and in my opinion just as frequently refuted. If the election of Kellogg and his title as governor de jure were admitted or not disputed, and there had been no investigation of the question of the legal existence of the Legislature which elected Pinchback, there might be force in the claim of a prima facie case. But here the title of the governor as well as that of the Legislature was in dispute when this election is said to have taken place.

After the pretended election of this governor and Legislature, the was in dispute when this election is said to have taken place.

After the pretended election of this governor and Legislature, the Committee on Privileges and Elections of this Senate was by resolution directed to inquire and report, not simply as stated the other day by the Senator from Mississippi, whether there was any governor of Louisiana or whether Kellogg had been duly elected, but whether "there is any existing State government in Louisiana, and how and by whom it is constituted." This inquiry, therefore, extended as well to the Legislature as to the governor. It concerned not only the governor, but the Legislature and any Senator claiming or who should claim an election as Senator by that Legislature: for, if there was no claim an election as Senator by that Legislature; for, if there was no legal Legislature, no legal Senator could be elected.

This inquiry was essentially a proceeding in rem, to which all the world, or at least all whose title depended upon its legal existence, were parties; and, if not bound to take notice of the investigation, certainly nothing more was necessary to bind them by it than notice of its pendency. Pinchback not only had that notice, but, after his of its pendency. Pinchback not only had that notice, but, after his pretended election, and when he was just as directly interested in it as Kellogg, was present at the investigation, suggesting and asking questions of witnesses, and himself being sworn and testifying as a witness. Now, the Senator from Indiana undertook in his reply to me last March to get rid of the force of this argument by saying that Pinchback was subpensed as a witness before the committee, from which, I suppose, he would wish us to infer that Pinchback had no chance to be heard or to introduce evidence to establish the validity of the Legislature upon which his own title as Senator depended. It will be time enough to raise this objection when it appears that he applied to be heard and to introduce evidence, and that this ap-plication was denied; for he certainly had notice, was present and testified; and, if he did not apply or ask to introduce evidence or to be heard in behalf of the Legislature which elected him and Kellogg who signed his certificate, we must infer that he was content with the mode in which the inquiry was conducted.

But we know enough of the majority of that committee to draw a very safe inference that if Pinchback had offered or proposed any testimony calculated to show a valid election of governor or Legislature, the evidence would have been heard. But the Senator from Indiana said the other day that, at the time of this investigation before the committee, Pinchback's credentials had not been presented to the Sen-If he can make anything out of that fact he is more ingenious than I can claim to be. But perhaps the Senator might enlighten us, if he would, as to the reason why his credentials had not then been presented here, and tell us whether he did not think his credentials to another body stood a better chance of being respected, and had not yet made up his mind to claim an election to the Senate.

But, Mr. President, that Committee on Privileges and Election made a thorough investigation of the election, both as to governor and made a thorough investigation of the election, both as to governor and the Legislature. They took a large volume of evidence and made a report which in ability, candor, and fidelity has seldom if ever been excelled in this or any other legislative body, a large majority of that committee being politically friendly both to Kellogg and Pinchback. And, with almost entire unanimity, they came to the conclusion that neither Kellogg or his legislature nor McEnery or his legislature had been elected, but that the entire election was void for frand and force, and that there was no legal government in Louisiana; and in this conclusion, in view of all the evidence, which I took the trouble to wade through, I fully concur. The evidence then being all before us, what have we to do with a mere prima facie case? The case should now be considered upon all the evidence, and no mere prima facie presumption can be of any avail. In the face of this evidence facie presumption can be of any avail. In the face of this evidence all such presumptions are overcome.

But, Mr. President, when I arose here on Friday last and gave way for an executive session I had not intended to allude to any of the points I have thus far touched.

I arose then for the purpose of calling attention to another point, and to protest against the construction now sought by the Senators from Mississippi, Indiana, and New Jersey to be put upon the resolution passed by the Senate upon Louisiana affairs on the 23d of March last, the resolution offered by the Senator from Rhode Island as a substitute for the resolution previously offered by the Senator from Indiana on the 5th of March. It is now insisted by the Senators to whom I have alluded that the adoption of that substitute was a recognition by the Senate of the legality of the Kellogg government and of the Legislature which elected Pinchback. Against any such construction of that resolution, for which I gave my vote, I feel bound

At the time of the passage of that resolution and during its disas well as the discussion of the Pinchback case, no one denied, or has ever since denied, that the Kellogg government was, in one sense, a government de facto; that is, in the sense that it was in the possession and exercise of power. But the real question was who put that government in power, and whether it was so far prima facie rightful that it could gain any validity by executive recognition. Many Senators, of whom I was one, maintained that that government, having been originally wrongfully set up by the Executive, upon the authority of a void order of Judge Durell and the forcible interference of the military, any recognition by the Executive would be merely a recognition of its own unauthorized action, and that no recognition of the Legislature thus wrongfully placed in power could bind the Senate in its decision upon the election of a Senator, or make that wrongful Legislature competent to elect a rightful Sen-

The original resolution of the Senator from Indiana was a declaration of the legal validity of the Kellogg government. That resolu-tion, for a reason which every Senator then here well understands, did not pass, and was not even pressed by its mover; and the reason was that its friends became satisfied, as every Senator here well understands, that it could not command the votes of a majority of the Senate. If it was believed by its friends that it could have passed, why did they adopt the substitute in its place? And if the substitute was understood by all Senators who voted for it to mean the same thing as the original, how did it happen to secure the vote which the original could not?

Is it not clear enough that at least a portion of Senators who voted for it, sufficient to have changed the majority, must have understood the substitute as not equivalent to the original resolution? The original resolution is in the following language:

original resolution is in the following language:

Resolved by the Senate, That the State government now existing in the State of Louisiana, and represented by William P. Kellogg as governor, is the lawful government of said State; that it is republican in form; and that every assistance necessary to sustain its proper and lawful authority in said State should be given by the United States, when properly called upon for that purpose, to the end that the laws may be faithfully and promptly executed, life and property protected and defended, and all violators of law, State or national, brought to speedy punishment for their crimes.

The substitute is as follows:

That the action of the President in protecting the government in Louisiana, of which W. P. Kellogg is the executive, and the people of that State against domestic violence and in enforcing laws of the United States in that State, is approved.

A simple comparison of these two resolutions shows clearly that the last leaves out all idea of the legality or validity of the Kellogg government so clearly asserted in the first. Can any man truly say, in view of the language of these two resolutions, in view of the discussion which took place upon either and upon the Pinchback case, and the true history of these resolutions, that the substitute was understood or intended as a recognition by the Senate of the rightful origin or subsequent legal validity of the Kellogg government? I say what is within my own knowledge, that the Senator who penned this substitute, in conversation with other Senators, before it was this substitute, in conversation with other Senators, before it was offered, disclaimed that construction and that intent.

Having voted for this substitute, it is proper to refer to my own understanding and interpretation of it, as given at the time, to which no word of dissent was uttered here by any friend of that substitute. I refer to the proceedings of the Senate of the 23d of March for the explanation which I made at that time of this resolution:

explanation which I made at that time of this resolution:

Before the vote is taken on this question I wish to state my understanding of the question. I understand the substitute offered by the Senator from Rhode Island, first, as an implied recognition of the Kellogg government merely, as one in the actual exercise of the governmental power in Louisiana, without reference to the question of its rightful origin or legal validity, and in no way involving the propriety of its establishment; second, that it approves the President's action so far only as directed merely to the protection of that government and the people of the State gainst domestic violence and civil war and to the enforcement of the laws of the United States, without approving any interference of the military with a legislative body or in the creation of a State government.

Such being, as it seems to me, the most natural and obvious sense of the language and the sense in which it will be most naturally understood by the people, while I adhere to the principles and conclusions which I announced here in my remarks on the 12th instant and which I here adopt by reference without retraction or qualification, and while I hold that a recognition by the Senate or by Congress of a government thus initiated can give it no greater validity than it had in its inception, still, as domestic violence and civil war which may lead to a complete dissolution of society are not the best remedy for getting rid of even an illegitimate government, I can approve the action of the President directed to the lumane purposes mentioned in the amendment or substitute offered by the Senator from Rhode Island.

And believing the recognition of this government for this purpose and to this and.

And believing the recognition of this government for this purpose and to this extent is justifiable under the peculiar circumstances now existing in that State, until by a fair election a more legitimate government can be instituted. I can vote for the resolution in the sense I have here attributed to it. But in the enlarged and odious sense which has been attributed to it by some of the speakers on the other side I could not vote for it; and I must deliberately avow my conviction that in such enlarged sense or in any sense which would assert the validity of the action by which that government was originally set up and put in power it could not secure the votes of a majority of this body.

I still adhere to this understanding and this interpretation of the substitute as it passed; and here again I repeat my entire conviction that if its friends, before the vote was taken, had claimed its effect to be what the Senators from Mississippi, Indiana, and New Jersey now claim for it, that resolution would not have passed the Senate.

In view of the history of this resolution, in connection with the original for which it was substituted, I must be permitted to say that to attribute to it the meaning that has been lately claimed for it seems to me to be "paltering in a double sense."

Mr. President, the question now before us is a question of law arising upon the facts of the case, and however anxious I may be to secure to this body another Senator of the political organization with whose principles I generally agree and having no objection to Mr. secure to this body another Senator of the political organization with whose principles I generally agree, and having no objection to Mr. Pinchback on the ground of color, if duly elected, my first duty as a Senator upon a question of legal and constitutional right like this is to guard myself against the influence of any partisan bias, to know nothing of the political opinions or party affiliations of the man who is seeking admission here, to decide the question for myself precisely in the same way as if he belonged to the opposite party. Such is the theory of the Constitution, and such I understand to be the obligation of the oath I have taken to support it.

We are admonished by the history of the past and the very nature

We are admonished by the history of the past and the very nature of popular government that the same political party cannot remain permanently in power. Change, repeated and oft-recurring change, is the law written by the hand of the Almighty upon all His works, and upon none more deeply engraven than upon the political parties in all popular governments. The rule we apply to the minority here to-day will justify and invite the like rule when, as must inevitably happen, we shall some day be in the minority here. The only safety of all, in questions like this, is to adhere firmly to the spirit of the fundamental law through all mutations of parties and party ascendency, however unpleasant the immediate consequences may seem. True wisdom overlooks and rejects all merely temporary advantages True wisdom overlooks and rejects all merely temporary advantages for a greater and more permanent future good; while folly sacrifices all the future to secure the advantage of the present hour. We may gain a Senator of our own political organization by disregarding and breaking down the principles of the Constitution and the laws. But I warn my political friends that, while we may gain in this way one Senator in this body for the short remnant of a single term, we shall lose much more before the people, at whose good will and pleasure this body is to be filled now and hereafter, if history teaches any lesson, if it has not been written in vain if it has not been written in vain.

It is by allowing the extravagance of party zeal and an overestimate of the importance of present party advantage to obliterate in the minds of public men and to weaken their appreciation of, and their attachment to, the great fundamental principles of their Gov-ernment and all fixed principles of law, and by setting all the rights ernment and all fixed principles of law, and by setting all the rights and interests of society and government afloat upon the wild sea of party strife and passion, to abide the hazard of temporary party contests, sinking or swimming and swaying to and fro with the alternate triumph and defeat of parties, without the anchorage or protection of any fixed principle which can command the assent and obedience of all. It is by such means and such habits of thought and action that not only parties in all popular governments become disintegrated, but that all the republics of the past, whose wrecks lie scattered along the track of time, have been shattered and destroyed.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me—

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Not quite yet. I shall be through in a minnte

And now upon the question of party interest. I cannot resist the conviction that the party which does most for the permanent welfare of the country will be most likely to command the permanent support of the people; and the only safe course for the welfare of the country and for our own interest is to be found in adhering with the same fidelity and tenacity to the Constitution and the law, when their opreation for the present moment may be against us, as upon occasions when they may be in our favor. If we ourselves trample upon the law, upon what ground can we claim to enforce the obedience of others?

I will close by asking this single, but pertinent question: How many of those now supporting Mr. Pinchback would vote for his admission if his politics and his party affiliations were reversed?

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I am not going to argue this Pinchback question again: I rise to make a few remarks. One is that I have sat in this body now for something more than fifteen years, and in that time I do not remember, and I do not think the records—and very accurately kept, you know, they are—will convict me of ever, in a single instance, having declined to allow any one of my colleagues on this floor to interrupt me when I was speaking, to make a suggestion or to ask a question. I do not believe I shall ever decline such an invitation while I do hold a seat on this floor.

Another remark I have to make is that while that is the line of con-

Another remark I have to make is that while that is the line of conduct I have prescribed for myself and have followed myself, I do not hold that it is the bounden duty of every other Senator to follow the hold that it is the bounden duty of every other Senator to follow the same; and I call attention to the fact that a great many Senators before the Senator from Michigan have declined to show me the same courtesy. That is their right. I shall pursue my own course, and I shall allow every other Senator to pursue his. I was listening intently to that admirably worded lecture which the Senator from Michigan felt called upon to read to his colleagues here in reference to their duty. I admired the sentiments. I wanted to ask him a single question, and that was about the practical application of his gospel. I wished to be informed whether he meant to intimate to the Senate, or to intimate to the world, or to suggest in the hearing of those angels who sit above the world, that those Senators who sit on this floor who do not adopt his conclusions in reference to the pending question are less mindful of those beautiful moral lessons he inculcated than he is himself; whether he means to be understood as advancing the suggestion that we do not as well know what political ethics and politisuggestion that we do not as well know what pointed ethics and pointed expediency teach as he himself; which is putting the question as strongly as I could put it. I thought it fair for that Senator to remember, as I tried the other day to suggest to other Senators, that the reason why we vote—I can speak with great positiveness as to the reason why I vote—to admit this claimant to a seat on this floor is not that I want to get another republican into this body, but for the reason that I believe Louisiana is entitled to another Senator on this floor, and that she has sent this very individual to take that seat by the authority of the only tribunal empowered to send a Senator here, and that is the Legislature of Louisiana, chosen by the people of that State.

Now I want to answer that very pertinent question with which the Senator from Michigan closed his remarks, whether there was a Senator on this floor who would vote for the admission of Mr. Pinchback to a seat here if he was sent here by the democratic party of Louisiana. I can tell that Senator that there is at least one Senator on this floor who would do it if he lived to vote upon the question. There is not a shadow of doubt about that; and the man who suggests or cherishes the impression that my judgment is controlled by political bias, does me a wrong, and I should be glad to believe that he did a wrong to himself.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to say a single word in reply to the some-what extraordinary speech of the Scnator from Michigan. The Scna-tor from Michigan closed his remarks with this sentence, which I read verbatim:

I will close by asking this single but pertinent question: How many of those now supporting Mr. Pinchback would vote for his admission if his politics and his party affiliations were reversed?

That is in the nature of a reflection certainly upon the motives of every Senator on this floor who supports the claim of Mr. Pinchback. The Senator from Wisconsin has answered for himself, and I think I can answer for myself, that with my views of the law I would support Mr. Pinchback for a seat although he was here as a democrat. port Mr. Pinchback for a seat although he was here as a democrat. When I so far forget my duty as to reject the title of a Senator to a seat on this floor because of his politics, when he has been legally elected, as I believe, I am unworthy of a seat myself. But now that the Senator from Michigan has thrown open this door, perhaps he would not be offended by the suggestion that if the politics of Pinchback and his party affiliations were reversed, perhaps he would stand a better chance to secure the vote of the Senator from Michigan than he does now. Perhaps the Senator from Michigan feels that in the vote he is about to give he represents those who elected him to this body and is representing his constituents.

Mr. President, the resolution passed this body last spring unequivocal in its terms indorsing the conduct of the President of the United States in sustaining the government of which William P. Kellogg is the executive. The President could have been justified in sustaining it, and the Congress could have been justified in indorsing his support of it only upon the ground that that was the government of Louisi-The resolution was explicit in its character. I know the Senator from Michigan when that resolution was before the Senate entered his explanation or his understanding of what the resolution meant. It was not replied to, for we were willing to let the Senator from Michigan vote for it upon any understanding that he might put forward as an excuse for it; but during the course of the discussion upon that resolution the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Thurman] offered the following amendment:

Provided, That nothing herein contained is meant to affirm that said Kellogg is de jure governor of Louisiana.

Upon that amendment the yeas and nays were taken, and it was voted down by 33 to 24; and among the names in the negative rejecting this construction of the resolution is the name of the Senator from

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Will the Senator allow me to say a word on that? The reason for voting against the that? The reason for voting against the amendment was that I claimed that the resolution meant the same thing without the amendment

Mr. MORTON. I voted against the amendment, and I claimed just

Mr. MORTON. I voted against the amendment, and I claimed just the opposite. If the Senator thought that a vital part of the resolution, he should have voted for this amendment, because it expressed the opinion he has expressed here to-day; but he veted the amendment down, or helped to do so, leaving the resolution to stand as a recognition of the character of Kellogg de jure as well as de facto.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?
Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. I put it to the Senator from Indiana whether if I had moved exactly the converse of that proviso he would not have voted against my amendment; whether he was not bound by an agreement in caucus that that resolution should pass without any amendment at all, and whether if I had offered precisely the converse of the proposition that I did offer he would not have voted against it?

Mr. MORTON. When the Senator asked me what I would have done in case he had done something, he is getting somewhat remote. I simply know that he offered that amendment declaring that it was a recognition of Kollogg de facto and not de jure, and I know that the Senator from Michigan helped to vote it down. I do not know that any such agreement was made in caucus. The Senator from Ohio knows more about our caucus than we do. Perhaps he can tell us something about another caucus that was held recently, which, report says, was not quite so harmonious.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator from Indiana will permit me to interrupt him, he says he does not know that such an agreement was made in caucus. I know that no such agreement was made in caucus, at least of republican Senators.

Mr. MORTON. Perhaps it was made in a democratic caucus. I think that statement of the Senator from Rhode Island substantially settles the question. Any explanation that may be given by the Senator from Michigan for voting against the amendment of the Senator ator from Michigan for voting against the amendment of the Senator from Ohio will not change the fact.

The Senator from Michigan said, in the course of his remarks, that there was no difference between the governor and the Legislature of Louisiana; that is to say, that if Kellogg was elected, the Kellogg Legislature was elected. That is the only proposition he advances that I agree to. I have always asserted it, and that the evidence showed that both were elected. The idea of drawing a distinction between the governor and the Kellogg Legislature was always a mistake.

The Senator said further that the investigation which took place before the committee in the winter of 1873, beginning early in January before the committee in the winter of 1873, beginning early in January and I think before Pinckback was elected at all, though I am not sure about that—and the report was made long before his credentials came to the Senate—was an investigation in rem, to which all the world were to the Senate—was an investigation in rem, to which all the world were parties, and that Pinchback and everybody else was bound by it. Now, sir, the principle contained in that proposition I repudiate. If that is the law in the State of Michigan, it is the fault of the supreme court there. It is not the law anywhere else. In the first place, the idea of the Senate being bound by any report of a committee is preposterous. I never heard it advanced except in this case. We have reports from time to time. They are simply for the information of the Senate. The Senate is never bound by a report.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Will the Senator allow me to say that I never claimed that they were?

Mr. MORTON. The Senator came so near it, that I am unable to understand the distinction. He said that was an examination in rem, and that the whole world was bound by it. Now, if the whole world was bound by it, the Senate was included.

was bound by it, the Senate was included.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. My language was that it was a proceeding

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, what an idea, that the Senate is bound by a report which is merely for the information of the Senate, and half the time in this body is overruled and disregarded! I simply state that proposition that it may be understood. But the idea that Pinchback was a party to it and bound by it, when his credentials did not go before that committee for nearly a year afterward, ten months or more

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to ask my colleague a question. I ask if the facts elicited in that investigation are the truth, as reported by the committee?

Mr. MORTON. My friend wants to ask me a question whether all the facts stated in that report are true. The facts are all true, but there are a great many things in that report which are not facts. [Laughter.]

Mr. McDONALD. Will my colleague point out the parts that are

Mr. MORTON. I cannot point them out this afternoon, because the volume is very large.

Mr. McDONALD. I will ask my colleague a more specific question.

Is it true that the Lynch board had no returns before them when they made up their certificate of election?

Mr. MORTON. I understand, although it is not very pertinent to this discussion, that the returns at that time were hid away by the Senator's political friends.

Senator's political friends.

Mr. McDONALD. Then they did not have them?

Mr. MORTON. They did not have those official returns, as I believe. They got the very best information they could get, but the returns were concealed, a part of which were forged, and the forged ones were necessary to constitute the democratic majority.

Mr. THURMAN. That is not so.

Mr. MORTON. I think it is so. Now, Mr. President, think of the idea of Pinchback being bound by an investigation to which he was not a party; where he had no power to subpœna witnesses; where he had no party; where he had he power to subpleha witnesses; where he had he right to cross-examine a witness unless by mere confresy as a spectator, or because he had been summoned himself as a witness! That is the doctrine advanced by the Senator from Michigan. I say it may be good law in Michigan, but nowhere else in this country.

Mr. MERRIMON. Will the Senator let me call his attention to a fact that bears a little on this point? At the time this investigation began, the resolution under which the investigation was made passed the Senate on the 16th of January, 1873. On the 21st day of January, 1873, Pinchback's credentials were referred to the committee. On the 22d day of January, 1873, Ray's credentials were referred to the committee. The committee was charged by the resolution to ascertain whether there was a State government in Louisiana.

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be instructed to inquire and report to the Senate whether there is any existing State government in Louisiana, and how and by whom it is constituted.

They had before them at the same time the credentials of both persons claiming to have been elected Senators from the State of Louisiana, and Pinchback was therefore in that sense a party to the investigation vestigation.

Mr. MORTON. I think all that has been gone over several times, with all due respect to my friend from North Carolina. I am talking about Pinchback's case, about his being bound by a report that was made ten months before his credentials went before the committee; and when the credentials did go before the committee several members of the committee had been changed, and there were members on it who had not heard the testimony. It may be the law of Michigan it who had not heard the testimony. It may be the law of Michigan that when a master in chancery makes a report—

Mr. WEST. Will the Senator allow me to ask him whether a committee whose term of office and function expired with one Congress could pass upon the credentials of a Senator in the next Congress?

Mr. MORTON. That is a very pertinent question. The idea is that the committee could pass on the credentials of Pinchback before the trime when his term began!

time when his term began!

Mr. MERRIMON. Did I understand the Senator from Indiana to say just now that Pinchback's credentials were not before the committee till eight or nine months after the committee made the report?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.
Mr. MERRIMON. You are very much mistaken. I call your attention to the record.

Mr. MORTON. I asked the Secretary, and he told me so the other day.

Mr. MERRIMON. I repeat that the resolution making inquiry whether there was a government in Louisiana passed January 16, 1873; Pinchback's credentials were referred to the committee on the 21st of January, 1873; Ray's credentials were referred on the 22d of January.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator whether a committee to expire on the 4th of March, 1873, could examine into the credentials of a Senator who was not to take his seat until the 4th of March, 1873? Could they investigate him in advance? Can an old Congress investigate.

tigate those who are to come into the new Congress?

Mr. MERRIMON. I answer there is no reason in the world why the committee should not.

Mr. MORTON. There is every reason in the world. They have no more power over him than they have over the next President. The Senate is the judge of the elections and returns of its own members; not the old Senate, but the new Senate.

Mr. MERRIMON. The Senate is a perpetual body.

Mr. MORTON. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana declines to be interrupted.

Mr. MORTON. It is this Senate that examines the qualifications of those who propose to take seats in this Senate, and it cannot examine the credentials of those who propose to take their seats in the next Senate.

next Senate.

Mr. MERRIMON. There is no such thing as the next Senate.

Mr. MORTON. The membership changes every two years, and a man's credentials cannot be very well examined until he applies for admission. It is simply a formal matter of notice.

I was going to make an illustration. A master in chancery by order of the court makes a report. Until that report is confirmed by the court, it would be preposterous, I think, in every State except in Michigan, to hold that the court and the parties were bound by a report made by a master in chancery, which had never been confirmed by the court. I think it would be still more preposterous to hold that a man who was not a party to the suit until after the report had been made should be bound by that report.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Will the Senator allow me to say a word? If this had been a suit before a justice of the peace or a master in this had been a suit before a justice of the peace or a master in chancery, the Senator from Indiana would undoubtedly be right; but, this being a public proceeding, every Senator and every man claiming to be elected to the Senate was bound to take notice of it.

Mr. MORTON. This is not a suit before a justice of the peace, and

It think but few justice's courts that I know anything about would have tolerated the technical and frivolous objections that have been urged against Pinchback's admission so long. He is sought to be kept out of his seat by the most technical objections; and in keeping him out the law that has been recognized in the case of every other member of this body has to be backed out. out the law that has been recognized in the case of every other member of this body has to be broken down. A governor has certified to his election, recognized by this body expressly as governor, recognized by a democratic House of Representatives expressly as governor, recognized by the courts, recognized by the President of the United States. He was elected by a Legislature that represented the majority of the people of Louisiana; and I undertake to say now to my friend from Michigan, and I do it with all kindness, that Mr. Pinchback represents the sentiments of a large majority of the people of Louisiana far more nearly than does the Senator from Michigan rep-resent the majority of the people of his State.

Mr. President, the rejection of Pinchback is the triumph of the original conspiracy. In that report for which the Senator has so much veneration that conspiracy is clearly proven, a conspiracy to overcome and destroy a majority of from sixteen to twenty thousand. It has been in progress ever since, and the rejection of Pinchback is the consummation and the final triumph of it. Not only has this conspiracy prevailed in Louisiana, but it has prevailed in other States; it has recently prevailed in Mississippi, and the notes of preparation are heard now in the State of South Carolina. It would be the triumph of injustice, it would be the triumph of the enemies of law and

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope so.

Mr. MORTON. I am about through with what I have to say on the subject. There are other things that I would like to say, but I shall waive my right.

Mr. STEVENSON. I understood the Senator from Indiana to say that it was not competent for the Senate to investigate the credenthat it was not competent for the Senate to investigate the credentials of a man elected to the Senate until the term of the Senator commenced. I would like to ask that Senator whether he did not controvert that very position when he offered his resolution to investigate the late election in Mississippi, which has not yet been disposed of. I would ask him also whether he did not claim and does not claim that the report of that committee in the Mississippi election may be used against Mr. Lamar, who is the Senator-elect?

Mr. MORTON. I have never said anything to that effect that any Senator has heard or I think anybody outside. What I may say shout the report in the Mississippi case when we get it I do not about the report in the Mississippi case when we get it I do not

Mr. STEVENSON. That would be unconstitutional, the Senator thinks

Mr. MORTON. Certainly unconstitutional in Mississippi, but con-

Mr. MORTON. Certainly unconstitutional in Mississippi, but constitutional in Louisiana!

Mr. STEVENSON. Unconstitutional in both.

Mr. MORTON. Unconstitutional in Mississippi, but constitutional in Louisiana to keep Pinchback out of his seat. On that report which he now says is so grossly unjust, how can my friend, as a constitutional man, as a lover of the Constitution, base an argument? How can he ground himself on an unconstitutional report

Mr. STEVENSON. I am always glad to enlighten my friend, especially when it causes me so little trouble as this. His own committee has reported that there was no legislature in Louisiana. A republican committee reported that fact, and I am unwilling to seat any Senator when there was no legislature to elect him. I have heard no such claim against the Mississippi Legislature; and that is the difference between the two cases.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MORTON. I was about done when my friend from Kentucky came in with his question about the investigation in Mississippi. There are a great many grounds for investigation in Mississippi without reference to the Senator that may have been elected from that State. If a majority of thirty thousand can be stricken down by violence in Missisppi, the country has a right to know it and has an interest in knowing it. If a majority of fifteen thousand or twenty thousand can be stricken down in Louisiana, it is important for the country to know it. The Senator thinks it was stricken down, and that the conspiracy succeeded. I think it was not stricken down, although the conspiracy is proved. The rejection of Pinchback, however, is the success of the conspiracy, and will be a "white-line" tri-

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. ["No!" "No!"] It is pretty late, and there is some business of importance to be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania. The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, inserting the word "not" before "admitted."

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BOOTH. On this subject I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. Oglesby.] I do not know how he would vote on this preliminary question, but I prefer not to vote.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. Clayton.] He would vote "yea," I suppose, on this motion, and I should vote against it if at liberty to do so.

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 29; as follows:

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Booth, Burnside, Clayton, Dawes, Goldthwaite, Oglesby, and Wadleigh—8.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After four minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened; and (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 7, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SAINT LOUIS.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. A bill (H. R. No. 2270) to provide for the purchase of material and for the continuance of the work on a building for a custom-house and post-office at Saint Louis, Missouri, came back from the Senate yesterday with amendments. I ask that those amendments be now taken from the Speaker's table and concurred in.

There was no objection, and accordingly the bill with the amendments was taken from the Speaker's table.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Insert after the word "material," in line 14, "as is not needed for the performance of the contract herein authorized, and;" and at the end of the provise insert: "And provided further, That the contracts herein authorized to be made shall not in the aggregate exceed the sum of $75,000."

So that as amended the provise will read: "Provided, That said Architect may, in his discretion, use such portion of said sum hereby appropriated for labor and material as is not needed for the performance of the contracts herein authorized, and as may be absolutely necessary for the proper preservation and progress of said building: And provided further, That the contracts herein authorized to be made shall not in the aggregate exceed the sum of $75,000."

Mr. WELLS of Microscopics.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. WALLING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2561) to repeal section 3309 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM BYERS.

Mr. GUNTER, (for Mr. GAUSE,) by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2562) for the relief of William Byers, of Batesville, Arkansas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

HENRY BRADLEY.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2563) for the relief of Henry Bradley; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SHIPPING LAW.

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, relative to the United States shipping law; which were referred to the Committee on Com-

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. COX also, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, relative to the national bankrupt law; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent that these resolutions in reference to the bankrupt law be ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman will not insist on that request. We are encumbering the RECORD too much.

OFFICERS, ETC., OF MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. JOHN REILLY, by unanimous consent, presented a list of the officers and professors of the West Point Military Academy, with rates of pay and allowances; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TRADING AT MILITARY POSTS.

Mr. LAWRENCE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2564) to prevent monopoly and exorbitant charges in trading establishments at military posts, and to secure good order at the same; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WITNESSES ON IMPEACHMENT TRIALS.

Mr. LAWRENCE also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2565) to protect witnesses on the trial of impeachments; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. PIERCE, by unanimous consent, presented a declaration of the Boston Board of Trade, in relation to the resumption of specie payments; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Cur-

Mr. PIERCE. I ask that this document be ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that it is not usual to print such memorials.

Mr. PIERCE.

Mr. PIERCE. The memorial of the New York Chamber of Commerce was ordered to be printed a few moments ago.

The SPEAKER. There was objection, and it was not ordered to be printed.

Mr. PIERCE. Then I withdraw the request.
Mr. PAGE. I call for the reading of the memorial.
The Clerk read as follows:

Declaration by the Boston Board of Trade, passed unanimously March 2, 1876.

Declaration by the Boston Board of Trade, passed unanimously March 2, 1876. In substantial concurrence with the New York Chamber of Commerce, the Boston Board of Trade declares its opinion—

1. That a general resumption of specie payment is alike indispensable to the reinstatement of our financial affairs upon a safe and enduring basis; to the restoration of confidence and activity in every branch of industry; and to renewed success in all the pursuits of commerce.

2. For the attainment of this end two things are needful, namely, an unalterable purpose on the part of Congress and the people to abide by the law of 1875, and the requisite ability on the part of the Government to redeem its legal-tender notes in coin at the time appointed in said law.

3. This ability must be acquired in two ways: by reducing the volume of United States notes prior to January 1, 1879, by funding a portion thereof in long bonds bearing a low rate of interest, and by an increase of gold in the public Treasury sufficient to hold the remainder of the notes redeemable, at the pleasure of the holders thereof. holders thereof.

sufficient to hold the remainder of the notes redeemable, at the pleasure of the holders thereof.

4. An attempt to accumulate in the Treasury an amount of gold sufficient to bring the whole existing paper currency to par of gold and hold it redeemable would, if practicable, be attended by most serious ill consequences, whereas, after a partial funding of the Treasury notes, the much smaller amount of gold needful to hold the remaining notes redeemable could be easily secured.

5. In contemplation of a resolute purpose of the Government and people to sustain the promise made in the act of January, 1875, for gold redemption of the legal-tender notes in 1879, provision will be made by or for all prudently managed banks to increase the gold portion of their reserves; and that such wholesome provision may be universal it should be required of all national banks by act of Congress.

The Boston Board of Trade, in behalf of the great interests which it represents, and of all the great industrial and productive interests of our whole country, now suffering, expressing the almost universal wish and opinion of New England people, and sustained by all the leading newspaper press of this section, republican, democratic, independent, literary, and religious alike, joins earnestly in the petition of other commercial bodies to Congress.

That the law of 1875 may not be repealed, and that its promise of redemption in 1879 may be made operative and effectual by—

First, the funding in long bonds bearing a low interest a portion of the outstanding legal-tender notes each year, beginning July 1, 1876.

Second, requiring the national banks to hold a yearly increasing proportion of their reserves in gold.

laid before the House, and referred to the Committee on Commerce. I now ask unanimous consent that the reference may be changed so that the documents shall go to the Committee on Military Affairs. I make this request with the consent of the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Unless there be objection the change of reference will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ARMY OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN.

Mr. CASON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2566) for the relief of officers and enlisted men of the United States Army during the late war who were promoted during absence from their commands; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TIMOTHY M'MAHON.

Mr. CASON also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2567) for the relief of Timothy McMahon, late a private of Company A, Thirty-fifth Regiment Indiana Volunteers during the war of the rebellion, from the sentence of court-martial, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPEAL OF RESUMPTION ACT.

Mr. CASON also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2568) to repeal so much of the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payment" as provides for the redemption of the legal-tender United States notes on the 1st day of January, 1879, approved January 14, 1875; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR HORSE CLAIMS, ETC.

Mr. DE BOLT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2569) to revive the law and extend the time for filing claims for horses and equipments lost by officers and enlisted men in the service of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DRAW IN BRIDGES OVER OHIO RIVER.

Mr. BANNING. I ask unanimous consent to present the memorial of the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, asking the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Ohio to oppose any change in the present law of Congress requiring a draw to be provided for every bridge hereafter to be built over the Ohio River, and move its reference to the Committee on Commerce, and that it be ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. It is the duty of the Chair again to say that it is not the custom of the House to order the printing of memorials of this kind.

Mr. BANNING. I think there will be no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. Objection has been made already this morning in similar instances.

Mr. BANNING. Very well. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce without printing.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HURLBUT. I now demand the regular order of business.

HYDE & MACKIE.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the Chair will by unanimous consent lay before the House several communications upon the Speaker's table, for reference.

Mr. HURLBUT. I of course yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a letter of the House, a communication from the Chief of Engineers on the claim of Hyde & Mackie; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. on Military Affairs.

SURVEY OF LITTLE TENNESSEE RIVER.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the provisions of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1875, the report of Major McFarland, of the Corps of Engineers, of the survey, &c., of the Little Tennessee River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from Major John J. Upham, Fifth Cavalry, in reference to section 2139 of the Revised Statutes; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS, NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of 22d of July, 1864, two reports of the surveyorgeneral of New Mexico on private land claims in said Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

MEMPHIS AND LITTLE ROCK RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House Mr. HENDERSON. Some days ago a letter from the Secretary of War with a report from the commandant at Rock Island arsenal was providing for the payment by the Quartermaster's Department of the amount due the Memphis and Little Rock Railroad Company for mail service performed prior to July 1, 1872; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

MAIL-ROUTE IN WISCONSIN.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, asking the establishment of a tri-weekly mail from Marquette, Green Lake County, to Portage, Columbia County; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

SCHOOL INDEMNITY SELECTIONS, NEBRASKA.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twelve minutes before one o'clock, and the regular order for this morning is the call of committees for reports of a public nature, the call resting with the Committee on Public Lands. At the close of the last morning hour the pending question was on the engrosement and third reading of a bill (H. R. No. 1952) to confirm certain school-indemnity selections of public lands by the State of Nebraska, reported from the Committee on Public Lands by the gentleman from Nebraska, [Mr. CROUNSE.]

Mr. CROUNSE. Let the bill be read.

The bill, which was read, provides that the selections of school lands made by the State of Nebraska as indemnity for tracts in sections 16 and 36 otherwise disposed of, which are suspended in the General Land Office for the reason that they are for lands which under the act of March 6, 1868, can only be disposed of under the homestead and pre-emption laws, and to which no other legal objection exists, be, and the same are thereby, confirmed; and title shall be transferred to the State as in other cases of such selections.

Mr. HOLMAN. Ought not this bill to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. CROUNSE. It is merely the substitution of one class of lands for another

Mr. HOLMAN. I will withhold the point of order until the explanation is made.

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair the point of order comes too late, as the question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I trust the gentleman from Nebraska will

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I trust the gentleman from Nebraska will explain the effect of the bill.

Mr. CROUNSE. I will do so. Under the act of 1854, organizing the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas, it was provided that when the surveys of public lands should be made and they should be brought into market sections 16 and 36 shall be reserved with the view of dedicating them to school purposes. Subsequently, and in the year 1864, when Congress enacted an enabling act with a view to admitting Nebraska into the Union, these sections 16 and 36 in the then Territory of Nebraska into the Union, these sections 16 and 36 in the then Territory of Nebraska were granted to the State for school purposes. The act also provided that where those lands had been settled upon, any of them, prior to the time of Nebraska's admission, she should have other lands in lieu thereof as contiguous as might be. Nebraska did make the selections, and these that are immediately concerned fall within the grant to the Union Pacific Railroad in Nebraska. act making that grant, as will be remembered, by one of its sections gives to that road ten alternate sections, the odd sections on either side of the road, for the purpose of enabling that company to build a line of road and telegraph.

One of the sections of that act of 1862 also provided that within two years after the time of mapping out and defining the line of its road the Secretary of the Interior should withdraw all the lands, both the odd and the even numbered sections, for the distance of twenty-five miles on either side of the road. They were to be withdrawn from settlement and private sale and pre-emption. That is the language of the section withdrawing that land, as appears by section 7 of the act of 1862. In pursuance of this provision of the act of 1862 all these lands shortly after were withdrawn. Subsequent thereto, and in 1862, in order not to retard further the settlement of Nebraska, an act was passed which modified that section, and which in terms restores the lands theretofore withdrawn under the act of July, 1862. It restores the even-numbered sections that were subject to settlement of the se It restores the even-numbered sections that were subject to settlement; it restores them to entry under the pre-emption and homestead laws alone. There is where the difficulty arises. In this act, which returns the lands again to settlement, it is provided that they shall only be open to settlement under the homestead and pre-emption laws. The act undoubtedly was passed thus broadly by an inadvertence, not respecting the rights of Nebraska, which had already made its selections within the limits where it was entitled to select in lieu of the sections numbered 16 and 36. This act paid no regard to those rights, and undoubtedly was a simple inadvertence; and if the movers of the measure had had their attention called to the effect it had upon Nebraska, no doubt the reservation would also have been made in Nebraska, no doubt the reservation would also have been made in behalf of Nebraska that she would get her indemnity lands.

All, then, that is asked by this bill relates only to a few sections of

All, then, that is asked by this bill relates only to a few sections of land which have been selected in the manner prescribed both by this special act framing an organic law with a view to the admission of Nebraska into the Union and also generally by the Revised Statutes, providing that where settlement has been made in advance of surveys of land, which in this case were the numbered sections 16 and 36, it should not be to the prejudice of the rights of the State entitled to those sections, but it should select others as nearly contiguous thereto as might be.

This has been done in the case of Nebraska, and I know of no reason, and none has been suggested to me, why this bill should not pass. I therefore ask that the bill may now be put upon its passage.

Mr. YEATES rose.
Mr. CROUNSE. I propose to hold the floor, but am willing to give the gentleman from North Carolina such reasonable amount of time as he may require.

Mr. YEATES. I believe the Speaker recognized me, and the previous question has not been ordered upon this bill.

Mr. CROUNSE. I have moved that the bill be put upon its passage, and I hold the floor for that purpose.

Mr. YEATES. The previous question has not been ordered and the Speaker has recognized me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must say that it is his duty to recognize the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Yeates] in subordination to the right of the gentleman from Nebraska to hold the floor.

Mr. YEATES. I do not propose myself to call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina therefore holds the floor subject to the control of the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. YEATES. I have sought the floor to say that I understand that this is nothing else than a proposition to do what this Congress refused to do in 1868. For years past Congress has been voting away the public lands to these new States; and I for one cannot understand why those new States are entitled to these lands any more than the other States for school or any other purposes. The last time these grants were before Congress several bills of this character passed; but I do not think that I would be doing right to sit still and allow this bill to pass without making inquiry about it. If the gentleman from Nebraska can show that he is in the right about these lands, I am willing that he should have his bill passed; but I am not willing to sit here any longer to vote away thousands of acres of land to peo-ple in one section of the country to the detriment of the people in other sections.

In 1862, as I understand it, Congress repealed the act that gives these lands to Nebraska; and in 1868 it passed another act that restored a portion of the lands to certain persons, but declined to give them to the State of Nebraska for school purposes.

Now the gentleman who presents this bill asks this House to give to the State of Nebraska an opportunity to go up and take an equal proportion of lands. For one, I raise my protest here against voting away these lands in millions of acres for any other purpose than for the benefit of the Government.

Mr. CROUNSE. I repeat again that gentlemen would have no opposition to this bill if they fully understood its provisions.

These sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections have already been given to the State of Nebraska under the enabling act; they have been distincted in the control of the state the State of Nebraska didder the channing acc; they have been distinctly and specifically given, and this bill merely provides that where these sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, by reason of settlement in advance of surveys, have been appropriated by settlers, the State shall not be deprived of what Congress intended to give it. I think there are only a few sections involved, and the bill provides that the State shall select these lands as nearly contiguous as possible to the original land granted. By an inadvertence in the act of March 6, 1868, these lands were restored only to pre-emption and homestead entry, and therefore the State of Nebraska asks to be permitted to secure sections within the State adjoining those to which they would secure sections within the State adjoining those to which they would have been entitled but for this act referred to.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CROUNSE. I will.

Mr. BLAND. I think it is the policy of this Government to give these lands for school purposes. So long as they remain public lands and under the control of Congress they are simply a corruption fund for the monopolists of this country, and it is the duty of Congress and the duty of the Government to see that these lands are first secured to actual settlers and the proceeds will go for the benefit of schools. the daty of the Government to see that these thins are first sectified to actual settlers and the preceds will go for the benefit of schools or for the benefit of some others besides corporations.

Mr. CROUNSE. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered;

and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read

the third time, and passed.

Mr. CROUNSE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

Mr. WALLING, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back, as a substitute for several bills referred to the committee, the bill H. R. No. 2041) to amend section 2291 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the proof of residence, occupation, or cultivation, the affidavit of non-altenation, and the oath of allegiance required to be made by section 2291 of the Revised Statutes may be made before the judge of any court of record of the county and State in which the lands are situated, and the said proof, affidavit, and oath, when so made and duly subscribed, shall nave the same force and effect as if made at the proper land district; and the same shall be transmitted by such judge or the clerk of his court to the register and the receiver, with the fee and charges allowed by law to him.

SEC. 2. That said proof, affidavits, and oaths shall be properly filed in the land office by the register, and copies thereof certified to by the register with his official seal attached shall be evidence of their contents in the courts of any State or of the United States.

Unued States.

SEC. 3. That if any witness making such proof or the said applicant making such affidavit or oath swears falsely as to any material matter contained in said proof, affidavits, or oaths, the said false swearing being willful and corrupt, shall be deemed guilty of perjury and shall be liable to the same pains and penalties as if he had sworn falsely before the register.

The amendments reported by the committee were as follows:

In line 6 of section 1, after the word "judge," insert the words "or, in his absence,

In the colork."

In line 8, section 1, after the word "situated" insert the words "and, if said lands are situated in any unorganized county, such proof may be made in a similar manner in any adjacent county of said State."

Mr. WALLING. The bill is in effect a substitute for House bill 121, introduced by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. OLIVER,] and House bill 237, introduced by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Lewis,] proposing to amend the homestead act by providing that final proof of settlement and cultivation under said act may be made by the claimant in the county in which the land is situated. The law by the claimant in the county in which the land is situated. The law as it now stands requires the final proof to be made by the claimant and his witnesses before the register at the land office of the district wherein the land is subject to entry or pre-emption. This bill permits such final proof to be made in the county in which the land is situated, before any judge of a court of record therein, or, in his absence, the clerk of his court, which proof, when filed in the proper land office, is to operate in the same manner and have the same effect as if delivered by the witnesses in person before the register. It will operate beneficially to the class intended to be benefited by the law, who in the very nature of their circumstances are unable to bear the expense of a long trip with their witnesses to the land office of their district. The bill is carefully guarded to prevent fraud and I trust will meet the approbation of the House.

will meet the approbation of the House.

I now yield to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Lewis,] whose constituents are peculiarly interested in the bill under consideration.

Mr. LEWIS. I hope there will be no opposition to this bill. In my State and in all States where public lands remain, I know the great inconvenience that is entailed upon those who enter lands under the homestead laws. I think this bill contains all the safeguards necessary to protect the Government. Section 2291 of the Revised States are residented and analysis. Statutes provides not only that the party entering the lands under the homestead law shall take the oath of allegiance and make affi-davit that he has not alienated said lands, but also he must prove by two disinterested witnesses before the register of the land office his residence or occupation of the same.

This in my State, and I suppose in other States, operates a great hardship. In Alabama there are two land offices, one in the extreme northern portion and the other in the southern portion of the State. A poor man cannot afford the expense of carrying two disinterested witnesses to these land offices in order to make the proof of residence, and yet if he fails to make within two years after the five years have expired he loses the benefit of his entry; and a man who can afford to pay for two witnesses to swear to his residence can go there and have the first entry set aside and thus secure the land. The law as it now stands has been abused by these means, and frauds have been practiced upon the Government in carrying witnesses down to Montgomery to make false affidavits.

Now, this is a bill for the relief of the poor men who are compelled now not only to bear the expenses of going to the land office themselves but of carrying with them two disinterested witnesses. These witnesses are disinterested, and therefore have no motive in going. witnesses are disinterested, and therefore have no motive in going. They are not willing to go with a man in a wagon, and he has to take them on the railroad and pay their expenses. This bill provides that this oath may be taken before any proper court authorized to administer oaths, a court of record, and that a copy of the affidavit shall be transmitted to and filed with the register of the land office, so that in case of false swearing there may be proof of it. Every safeguard for the protection of the Government is thrown around it by the bill, and it is simply for the relief of the poor man who has entered land under the law. I hope it will meet no objection. The amendments reported from the committee are eminently proper, because in some of the Western States there are no county courts; their county affairs, as in Iowa, are administered either by chancellors or by judges whose jurisdiction embraces several counties; so that in the absence of the judge it would be proper that the oath be taken before the clerk of the court. Mr. DUNNELL. This bill, I am aware, has its merciful side; yet

Mr. DUNNELL. This bill, I am aware, has its merciful side; yet I think it deserves a great deal of serious consideration. It will be seen at once that it changes the whole land-office system of business; it is an entire revolution in this class of public business. Now all the business touching our public lands must be transacted at the office of the register and receiver, and this bill proposes that it shall be transacted at the county seat. It is an entire change of the present system. I know that under that system there are hardships. I know that in my own district poor men have to travel two hundred miles to reach a land office. But that which is merciful may also be dangerous.

Parties under this bill may go to the county seat and make their application; that application is valuable only as it is correct in description. Now, what officer at the county seat of any county in which there are public lands, or in any State where there are public lands, knows anything about those lands in some far-off county?

The plats are not there, the land-office records are not there. The county officer is liable to be deceived, to be misled. In my judgment, this would be an exceedingly dangerous innovation. It looks merciful, but I certainly think that this bill, which was defeated in the last Congress and also in the Forty-second Congress, ought to receive very serious consideration before it is passed.

The frauds which would grow out of this bill, if it become a law, and the real injury done to settlers by those frauds, would more than counterbalance any advantage that would result from it. I may be mistaken in this; I do not wish to prolong this discussion. I know very well the Committee on Public Lands have a great many important measures to report to this House, but I must say, remembering my own district, which is as much interested in this matter as any district represented on this floor, having looked at the subject in the past, I deem this to be a dangerous piece of legislation.

Mr. WALLING. I desire to say to the gentleman from Minnesota
[Mr. DUNNELL] that this legislation is recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. DUNNELL. I thank the gentleman for that statement; I forgot to ask the question.

Mr. WALLING. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. OLIVER] for five minutes, after which I propose to call the previous question.

Mr. OLIVER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] entirely misapprehends the scope of this bill. It does not provide for making preliminary applications before the courts and the judges.

Mr. DUNNELL. I so understood the bill. If it only applies to final proof, then I have no further objection to make. My former remarks show the view in which I regarded the bill, on the ground that it covered all business at the land offices.

Mr. OLIVER. The gentlemen has missunderstood it; there is no

Mr. OLIVER. The gentleman has misunderstood it; there is no such provision in this bill. That is now, and has long been, the law, and has not resulted in any inconvenience whatever. The gentleman and has not resulted in any inconvenience whatever. The gentleman seems to apprehend that there may be danger, if this bill should pass, that frauds and abuses will arise. As the law exists now, the parties are compelled to take their witnesses and go to the land office, and in my part of the State of Iowa in many cases this is more than two hundred miles, entailing a great hardship upon the poor settlers.

As to the question whether it will lead to abuses, at present these witnesses go to the land office, are carried there by the parties themselves for the express purpose of testifying. Unknown as they are to the land officers, who cannot be assured of their characters, and cannot examine them, I submit there is much greater danger of the land officers being imposed upon in such cases at the distance of two land officers being imposed upon in such cases at the distance of two hundred miles from where the witnesses live, than if their testimony was taken in the county of their residence before a responsible officer, acquainted with the witnesses and with their character. When they come to give their testimony in the county they are confronted by their fellow-citizens, and if they testify to anything that is false, it is known at once and they are subject to the penalties of the law. If they testify falsely at the land office it may be years before that is known. I submit that there is no danger of any abuse under this bill. It has been recommended by the General Land Office and will afford relief to the citizen and additional security to the Government. ment.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Allow me one moment on this proposition. I concur in all my friend from Iowa [Mr. OLIVER] has just said in relation to this bill. In my district there are two land offices, and many of my constituents travel from one hundred to two hundred miles, at a very heavy expense, required to take their witnesses to the land office. In many instances they go there and we do not know what the proof is for months after. It often costs a poor man to secure his homestead more than it is actually worth after he has acquired it. The Land Office has recommended it, and I am sure that there is no representation that early deeper before this House that would be neft the proposition that could come before this House that would benefit the proposition that could come before this House that would benefit the actual settler more than the measure now pending, because it allows the settler to go before the county officers, taking his witnesses, to be confronted there by his opponents. There the testimony can be taken and due weight given to it; its bearing upon every point can be properly understood; so that there can be no opportunity for fraud.

But under the present system the man of wealth can take his witnesses one or two hundred miles in order to make his proofs, while the poor man is totally denied that right, for the reason that it requires more money than he can possibly raise to make the necessary proofs to secure his homestead. As a settler on the frontier who has resided there for twenty-five years, I believe that this is a just bill, and I hope it will pass.

Mr. WALLING. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. Steele] to offer an amendment which I believe is entirely acceptable to the committee.

Mr. STEELE. Being in favor of the provisions of this bill, which I regard as advantageous to the settlers, I offer the following amendment to make the bill applicable to the Territories of the United States, which would not be embraced by the present language of the

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I rise to correct

an error in the statement of my friend from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] who says that this bill was defeated in the last Congress. It is not proper to say that the bill was defeated; it only did not pass. It was fully and fairly considered in the Committee on Public Lands of this House; and the provisions found in the present bill were in-corporated in the general bill which passed the House at the last ses-sion. That measure went over to the Senate, where for want of time, and possibly for some other reasons which I do not know, it did not and possibly for some other reasons which I do not know, it did not pass; and so failed to become a law.

According to my recollection, this provision in the general homestead bill of last year met the approbation of the Land Department, and, if I am not mistaken, it also met at that time the approbation of my friend from Minnesota. The bill was very carefully considered. It was debated in this House, and, if I remember aright, it received the almost unanimous approbation of the House.

The difficulties that are encountered by settlers in the sparsely settled States of the Union and in the Territories have been so wall set tled States of the Union and in the Territories have been so well set forth by the gentleman from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. OLIVER] that I need not recapitulate them here. It was shown to us, however, in the last Congress that on many occasions and in many places settlers upon the public lands have to occasions and in many places settlers upon the public lands have to go from two hundred to three hundred miles in order to make proof of their occupation and settlement, so that the expenses of taking their witnesses to the land office are greater than if they were allowed to purchase public lands at $1.25 per acre. We felt that there were great hardships imposed upon the settlers. The facts brought to the attention of the committee were sufficient to induce them to make a unanimous report, and when the bill was brought before the House it received, as I have already said, the almost unanimous support of the House. I therefore think there ought to be no hesitation in passing this bill ing this bill. Mr. PAGE.

Mr. PAGE. At the last session of Congress, when the bill provid-ing for the sale of public lands under the homestead law was under consideration, I introduced an amendment similar to the provision consideration, I introduced an amendment similar to the provision now embraced in the bill before us. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Townsend,] if I remember rightly, reported that bill, and an amendment of this kind, was opposed by a portion of the committee and failed to become a part of the law. I urged at that time that it was of importance to the people in the Western States, particularly in California and Oregon, that a provision similar to the one embraced in this bill should be incorporated in the homestead bill which resear the Hause at the last Congress.

which passed the House at the last Congress I have always been in favor of a measure of this kind. As has been stated by my colleague, [Mr. LUTTRELL,] it will effect a great saving of expense to the people of my State, who are now compelled to travel in some instances hundreds of miles where there are no railroads to go to the land office to testify, when the evidence could as well be presented before a local officer of the country where the lands are situated and thus a great saving of expenses he officered. These the bill uated, and thus a great saving of expense be effected. I hope the bill will pass. I cannot see why any gentleman here should urge any objection to it. It is evidently in the interest of that class of people who are endeavoring to obtain homes for themselves upon the public

MRS. PHŒBE C. OAKLEY.

Mr. McDILL, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 2442 a bill (H. R. No. 2570) legalizing the homestead entry of Mrs. Phœbe C. Oakley, of Bay County, Michigan; which was read a first and second time.

which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It provides that the homestead entry of Mrs. Phœbe C. Oakley, of Bay County, Michigan, No. 2713, embracing the east half of northwest quarter of section 18, in township No. 14 north, of range No. 3 east, in the State of Michigan, be declared to be as valid as though she was the head of the family within the meaning of the homestead laws; and upon the proofs of occupancy and improvement by herself and family in the time and manner as required by law, the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall cause to be issued to her a patent therefor.

Mr. McDILL. Mr. Speaker, I will state briefly that this is the case of a woman who has a husband living, but that husband, while legally the head of the family, is but little more than a drunken, worthless fellow, depending upon her for support. Supposing she had the right to enter lands under the homestead law, she has done so, has labored upon the land and put something like a thousand dollars' worth of improvements upon it. Now, upon a strict construction of the homestead law it is held that she is not the head of a family, and consequently her entry is about to be canceled, and will be canceled within the next thirty days unless this law should pass. The Commissioner of the General Land Office approves of the bill, as will be seen by the letter which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

MARCH 7, 1876.

SIR: I have received at the hands of Hon. N. B. BRADLEY bill II. R. No. 2442, with the request that a report be made to you by this Office upon the subject

In compliance with the request, I have the honor to suggest the following amoudments:

First. In lines 8 and 9 strike out the words "the same had been made by her husband, Martin M. Oakley," and substitute the words "she were the head of the family within the intent and meaning of the law."
Second. In lines 11 and 12 for "the Secretary of the Interior" substitute "the Commissioner of the General Land Office."
With these amendments the bill has my cordial approval, the testimony on file in this Office showing the case to possess in its equities peculiar claims to consideration.

eration.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

L K. LIPPINCOTT, Acting Commissioner.

Hon. MILTON SAYLER, Chairman Committee on Public Lands, House of Representatives.

Mr. McDILL. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read

the third time, and passed.

Mr. McDILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was assed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STATE TAXATION OF RAILROAD GRANTS.

Mr. CROUNSE, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1545) declaring lands heretofore granted to certain railroad companies subject to State taxation, with amendments.

The bill, which was read, provides in the first section that no provision contained in either the act entitled "An act to aid in the con-Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal and military purposes," approved July 1, 1862, or the act amendatory thereto, approved July 2, 1864, shall be so construed as to exempt from taxation by State authority lands which either of the companies in said acts mentioned, or its successors, shall have earned by the construction of its road, or parts thereof; provided that such road or parts thereof shall have been first accepted by the United States in the manner in said acts prescribed; and taxes assessed either before or such as may be assessed after the passage of this act, upon lands earned by said companies, or their successors, or either of them, shall be valid as against any claim or title of the United States in or to such lands.

The second section provides that if any company entitled to said lands or parts thereof shall fail to pay the costs of surveying and selecting the same, or the land officer's fees, the purchaser of any of said lands at tax sale may pay such costs and fees due upon the lands by him purchased to the proper officer, and thereupon letters-patent shall issue to such company, conveying said lands to it, but subject to the legal rights and title of such tax-sale purchaser.

The Clerk read the amendments, as follows:

In line 9 after the word "sixty-four" insert "or in any act of Congress granting lands in aid of the construction of any railroad or wagon-road."

In line 10 strike out the word "either" and insert the word "any."

In the second section, line 3, after the word "fees" insert the words "where such payment is required by any of said acts."

Add to the end of the second section the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as enlarging any grant of land heretofore made to any of said companies.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe this bill is subject to the point of order that it has the effect of making appropriation of public lands. If it does appropriate public lands, I make the point of order; but, if that is not the case, of course I do not insist on the point of order.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. It does not make any appropriation of public land.

Mr. SAYLER. The gentleman from Indiana is entirely mistaken in his point of order, as this bill does not make any appropriation of public lands.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the bill, as I am told, merely provides for State taxation of lands granted for railroad purposes, then I have no point of order to make. I hope, however, we shall have some explanation of the bill before we are asked to put it on its passage.

Mr. CROUNSE. Mr. Speaker, the short time allotted to the Committee on Public Lands forbids my entering into any lengthy discussion of the many suggestions which occur in reference to the provisions of this bill. The most I can hope to do is to present to the House as briefly as possible the proposed law, so that members may act intelligently upon it. As its title purports, the object of the bill is to subject the large bodies of lands granted to the several railroad corporations in aid of the construction of their roads to State taxation. In the first instance the bill was pointed more particularly at the Unio Pacific instance the bill was pointed more particularly at the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific Railroads and the branches provided for in the act of 1862 and the act amendatory thereof passed in 1864. On the demand of others and after due consideration by the committee, the bill has been made general in its terms, so as to apply to all acts granting land in aid of the construction of any railroad or wagon-road.

Now, it seems to me it needs but little more than a simple statement of what is proposed by this bill to commend it to the favor of all who are called upon to act upon it. What reason there is, or should be,

why lands of railroad corporations should be allowed immunities and privileges not granted to the settler is one of the questions which puzzles my people as well as the people of Kansas and other States interested in this subject. It will be remarked that under the act of 1862 as amended by the act of 1864 the roads therein designated were given ten alternate secact of 1904 the roads therein designated were given ten alternate sections on each side of the road, making twenty alternate sections for every mile of road which should be built. In my State alone I think I am safe in saying that 10,000 square miles of land were dedicated to the benefit of these railroads, and that only when the roads choose to patent the lands can they be subjected to State taxation under The States of Nebraska and Kansas have tried the question, but the interpretation of the law by the courts seems par-ticularly favorable to these corporations, and State taxation has been prohibited. One clause of the act of 1864 amendatory to the act of 1862, passed for one purpose, has been invoked for an entirely different purpose. The law provides that so many sections of land shall be given to these corporations; that, upon the completion of twenty miles of road and inspection and acceptance by the Government commissioners appointed for that purpose, bonds to the extent of $16,000 a mile, and $48,000 a mile in other instances, shall be delivered to the respective companies, and at the same time patents shall be issued to the company for the several tracts of lands to which they may be entitled. But, as will be seen, these roads were built very rapidly. The construction of them, under the terms given by the United States, proved to these companies a perfect bonanza. They were wrestling with each other to see who should build the most of these roads; and well they might, for the subsidy, both in bonds and lands, which they got from the building of these roads was a most lucrative enterprise. But in this rapid construction of these roads it was but natural that they should go in advance of settlement and in advance of the survey of the public lands. Therefore, in order to provide for that condition of affairs, section 21 of the amendatory act of July 2, 1864, being the last section but one, says:

That before any land granted by this act shall be conveyed to any company or party entitled thereto under this act, there shall first be paid into the Treasury of the United States the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying the same by the said company or party in interest, as the titles shall be required by said company, which amount shall, without any further appropriation, stand to the credit of the proper account, to be used by the Commissioner of the General Land Office for the prosecution of the survey of the public lands along the line of said road, and so, from year to year, until the whole shall be completed, as provided under the provisions of this act.

Then here is a provision in the bill which simply provides that, in case the company desires these lands in advance of the time they should be surveyed under the direction of the surveys or at the volition of the Government, in such event they shall advance to the Government, shall pay to the Commissioner of the General Land Office for that purpose, the expenses of the surveys, and thereupon the Government will go to work and survey the land for the benefit of the

But by the provisions of the act, section 4, to which I have referred, it will be seen that the lands thus granted, in consideration of the construction of the road, are absolutely those of the companies as much so as the very bonds that were advanced to them. But it became desirable to have the bonds, because they could be converted into ready money at once to be used immediately; but it has proven not so desirable to obtain patents for these lands. Under the rule that now prevails, these companies take out patents only from time to time as they make sales of these lands; although the lands are theirs, they nevertheless do not possess themselves of the muniment of title, in order that they may not be taxed for the lands they own until it suits their pleasure.

Now, the purpose of this bill is to put these companies on the same footing as any member in this House who may own lands in those States; it is to put the railroad companies on the same footing as the struggling settler, who has to deprive himself of the very necessaries of life to meet the taxation which inexorably comes around with every recurring year. These companies as the case stands now seem to be above and higher than the law.

The case which arose in Kansas, known as the Prescott case, asserts two principles as pertaining to the taxation of this class of lands. There is a provision in these Union Pacific Railroad grants that within three years after the completion of the road, if they shall not have sold their lands, they may be bought by any settler at the Government price, and the proceeds paid to the company. I know, however, of no instance where this has ever been acted upon. The other provision which was invoked is that which I stated, where because the company had not taken out its patent the courts for that reason held the lauds were not taxable.

Now, to those gentlemen who are schooled in the law this proposition is plain, that where the grantor has passed from him or handed over every equitable interest in a piece of land, that land becomes taxable as the property of the grantee; that is so in case of a pre-emption, where all the requisites have been conformed to as to proof and settlement, and all that which is described in the laws relating to settlements; and where the price has been paid and nothing remains to be done but simply to deliver formally the patent, in those cases it is then held and has been repeatedly decided in the Supreme Court of the United States that in those cases lands are taxable. The parties receiving the title to the lands receive the entire equity, and nothing remains in the Government.

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?
Mr. CROUNSE. Let it be a short one.
Mr. PAGE. I want to know why this bill does not apply to all railroads receiving land grants?
Mr. CROUNSE. It does. The amendment provides for all, both railroads and wagon-roads.

I was about remarking that a distinction was made in this case, based on this twenty-first section. I will repeat its substance again, that it may be understood by the House. The section states that— Before any land granted by this act-

It states that the lands have been granted and are the property of the road. But it says:

Before any land granted by this act shall be conveyed to any company or entitled thereto under this act, there shall first be paid into the Treasury of the United States the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying the same by the said company or party in interest.

There it is. It is the simple pittance due to the Government, the There it is. It is the simple pittance due to the Government, the small sum it is necessary to pay for the survey of the land, and to pay for the patent and conveyance of it—just that which forms the bultwark behind which these companies hide themselves and have hidden themselves successfully. Judge Miller, who delivered the opinion of the court in the Prescott case, (16 Wallace, page 603,) plants it upon two grounds: One was that the equity had not passed from the Government; that the Government had yet the legal interest in the lands to the extent of the price of the surveys, and therefore that the lands to the extent of the price of the surveys, and therefore that the lands were not subject to State taxation. He put it also on the other ground, that there was a provision in relation to the sale of any lands undisposed of after three years from the completion of the road.

In a more recent case, that of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, appellants, vs. C. McShane, treasurer, &c., and others, which is not yet published in any volumes of the Supreme Court reports, but a copy of which I have obtained, Justice Miller, in delivering the opinion of the court in that case, abandoned or reversed a portion of his former decision, so much as relates to this failure to sell within the three years. Now the object of this bill is to provide that no provision contained in either the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal and military purposes," approved July 1, 1862, or the act amendatory thereto, approved July 2, 1864, shall be so construed as to exempt from taxation by State authority lands which either of the companies in said acts mentioned, or its successors, shall have earned by the construc-

This is done in order to prevent any quibbling about the matter. It first provides that the lands shall be the lands of the companies because of their having earned them; because, where they have earned them and the road is complete, the title to the lands as a matter of course passes to the company; and it provides that in that class of cases where they shall have become the real owners, as in any other individual case, it shall not be exempt from taxation. But we have added this provision, also, that such road or parts thereof shall have been first accepted by the United States in the manner in said acts prescribed; and taxes assessed either before or such as may be assessed after the passage of this act upon lands earned by said companies or their successors, or either of them, shall be valid as against any claim or title of the United States in or to such lands.

Mr. BLAND. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. What I desire to know is whether the bill might not possibly give a title to these lands to the railroad company before they have earned them?

Mr. CROUNSE. I have added a proviso covering that point.

Mr. BLAND. The difficulty is that by a mere tax-sale the title might vest in the railroad company before they had actually earned the lands.

Mr. CROUNSE. By reference to the former part of the bill the gentleman will see that it applies only in cases where the lands have been earned and the road accepted.

Mr. BLAND. Section 2 is hardly explicit on that point.

Mr. CROUNSE. This bill, Mr. Speaker, has been drafted with great care. There was an attempt made in the last Congress by the use of a great deal of language to frame a bill for this purpose, but it was left too broad and too much open to construction. This bill has been very maturely considered, and I apprehend that it meets the object aimed at as fully as any bill which could well be drafted would do.

Now, I can dwell no longer on the legal aspect of the case, although, if any gentlemen have doubts upon it, I am willing to answer such questions as may occur to them; but, as to the justice or propriety of these railroad companies paying taxes on the lands, I do not see that there can be any variety of opinion. I may state here that the Union Pacific Railroad has mortgaged its entire amount of lands for $10,000,000. It sells its lands in the market. It is getting about $5 an acre for all the lands it sells. All settlers are excluded from those lands, and have been excluded since the inception of the act of 1864. The company hold the lands for every conceivable purpose except taxation. They hold them for mortgage; they hold them for sale, because they have sold about two million acres already, and have received a good price for them. Every day their lands are being enhanced in value by the sweat and toil of the settlers upon the alternate sections. The alternate sections are sold for $2.50 per acre, and the settler strains himself to pay that amount, and by industry labors to meet taxation; and by his building up school-houses, bridges, and courthouses, and in all the various ways that men improve and advance settlements, the lands of the railroad company are also advanced in value and it does seem a hardship, to which my people and the people of Kansas and of other States situated in like manner should not be subjected, to have them to submit to burdens from which these companies are relleved.

Mr. BLAND. I will suggest to the gentleman an amendment in section 2, by inserting after the word "thereof" in line 2 the words "as aforesaid;" so that it will read:

SEC. 2. That if any company entitled to said lands or parts thereof as aforesaid shall fail to pay the costs of surveying and selecting the same, or the land-officer's fees, the purchaser of any of said lands at tax-sale may pay such costs and fees due upon the lands by him purchased to the proper officer, and thereupon letters-patent shall issue to such company, conveying said lands to it, but subject to the legal rights and title of such tax-sale purchaser.

That refers back directly to the first section.

Mr. CROUNSE. I see no objection to that amendment. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. Phillips,] who has introduced a similar bill as the one now being considered and who has exerted himself to secure its passage.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. The gentleman from Nebraska, who has this bill in charge, [Mr. CROUNSE,] has so fully stated its purport that I need not consume much of the time of the House. A bill almost identical with this, varying just as stated by the gentleman, passed this House in the last Congress, but failed to receive consideration in the Senate.

ration in the Senate.

These separate railroad companies, these different branches of the Pacific Railroad Company to-day hold fifty millions of acres of land without paying taxes thereon, and hold that land for speculative purposes; for ten years they have held the greater part of this land. Settlers purchasing land from them or occupying the alternate sections of the public lands give these railroads the benefit of their labor and money in so far as they enhance the value of the lands held by the railroad company. From the moment the settler gets possession of his land he commences to pay taxes; he enhances the value of the railroad lands not only by his improvements, but by paying taxes upon the land which he holds for all purposes, school, local, and general. At the same time these lands held by the railroad companies for ten years for speculative purpose are exempted from all taxation. The railroad companies have, by sheltering themselves under a clause of the law, succeeded in evading taxation. The purpose of this bill is the law, succeeded in evading taxation. The purpose of this bill is to compel these companies to pay taxes upon the land held by them just as other people pay taxes.

Under the act of 1862, granting lands and subsidies to these companies, one section provides that each of these companies shall have ten alternate sections of land on each side of the line of road, and that on the completion of each forty miles of road commissioners shall be on the completion of each forty miles of road commissioners shall be appointed to examine, report upon, and accept the road, if properly constructed, and to certify to the President that the road has been completed and accepted. The next section of that act provides that upon the acceptance of the road the railroad company shall receive of the bonds of the United States some $16,660 per mile, and at the same time of the acceptance of these bonds they were to have conveyed to them the lands to which they were entitled under the act. The bonds in all cases were delivered: the company has received the bonds and used the proceeds in construction the road.

In the act of 1864 a clause was inserted that these companies should be compelled to pay the cost of surveying and certifying, a small fee. This they have failed to pay; they have failed to claim the patents for the land to which they were entitled, and in that way they evade the payment of taxes. The purpose of this bill is to place them, so far as the Government is concerned, where they will be compelled to pay taxes on the lands which they own. I think its purpose is one which will commend itself to this House, as it did to the House at the first session of the last Congress.

It is true that these railroads have mortgaged nearly all of the lands granted them. Now, if they had the right to convey the lands by mortgage, then they owned the lands. If they did not own the lands, they had no right to convey them by mortgage without subjecting themselves to prosecution for a penal offense. Should you or any gentleman upon this floor purchase from one of these companies a section or a half a section of land, they would obtain a patent for that section or half section, file it in the office of the company, record it, and then convey it to you; and from that moment you would pay and then convey it to you; and from that moment you would pay taxes on the land, while these companies continue to hold millions of acres without paying any taxes; a proceeding never contemplated by this House in its former action, and which you are now called on to put forever to an end.

I will not consume much of the time of the House upon this subject, because I know the Committee on Public Lands have much valuable business before them upon which they desire to report to the House. The settlers who have to-day given to the public lands the benefit of their labor and capital and improvement, and are constructing farms and paying school, county, and State taxes, ask that this bill shall be passed providing that these companies shall pay the same taxes as are assessed against the settlers, and that aid to construct a road shall not be made the excuse for speculation, which adds to its emoluments by evading just taxation.

Mr. CROUNSE. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments reported from the committee were agreed to. *

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The next question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAND.]
Mr. CROUNSE. There is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CROUNSE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SAYLER. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to report back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, Senate bill No. 34, to confirm pre-emption and homestead entries of public lands within the limits of railroad grants in cases where such entries have been made under the regulations of the Land Department.

Mr. RUSK. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. RUSK. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. SAYLER. I would inquire if my bill is now before the House.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in the custody of the House.
The regular order is called for.

Mr. BLAINE. What is the regular order?
Mr. RUSK. The morning hour has expired.
Mr. BLAINE. Morning-hour business does not necessarily terminate unless something shall intervene of a higher privilege. The morning hour does not terminate in sixty minutes; unless something of a higher privilege shall terminate it, it runs all day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the object of the call for the regular order to be to present such a question.

the regular order to be to present such a question.

Mr. BLAINE. That ought to be settled now, because it is an important matter. If a committee has reported during the morning hour, the simple expiration of the sixty minutes does not terminate the consideration of that business; unless something of a higher privilege shall intervene, it lasts all day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that.

IMPEACHMENT OF WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

Mr. CLYMER. I rise to a question of privilege. Mr. Speaker, last evening a subpœna, issued by the supreme court of the District of Columbia holding a criminal court for this District, was served upon me, and I believe upon the other gentlemen who are members of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department. The one served upon myself was a duces tecum, commanding me to bring with me certain papers and to testify with relation to charges pending in that tain papers and to testify with relation to charges pending in that court against the late Secretary of War.

This morning, accompanied by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Robeins] and the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Black-Burn,] I appeared before that court, and, by the permission of the president judge, I made, on behalf of myself and the committee, a statement. I said that in obedience to the law we appeared at the bar to obey any order the court might make; that as a member of the committee of this House I felt that it would be prejudicial to the best interests of the country to compel us to state what had trans-pired in the room of the committee of which we were members; that I believed that it would not only close the mouths of all witnesses, but would in many cases drive them from the land. I said furthermore that, while not pleading our privileges as members of this House, as we might have done, we yet protested against being examined; and that we would only consent to be so examined after an order made specially to that end by the court. The court was kind enough to take time for deliberation, and determined that if it needed us hereafter it would send for us.

I have felt it due, not so much to myself personally as to myself in my capacity as a member of this House, that I should state precisely what we have done. Other gentlemen who appeared before the bar with me at the same time made also statements to the court; and I with me at the same time made also statements to the court; and I have no doubt that they would be pleased to have the privilege of stating for themselves the matter as they presented it. After that presentation has been made, I desire that this House may take such action upon the question as it may deem necessary, right, and just.

Mr. BLAINE. May I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] a question? I would like to know whether the court asked or desired to ask any question to read to ask any question.

or desired to ask any question touching any matter that was not contained in the public report, which is a matter of public record and general notoriety, but which of course could not be used in evidence. I can very well conceive that the gentleman from Pennsylvania might not wish to be called upon in any court to testify of that which was still a committee secret; but, as to any point of delicacy arising upon matters which are as common as history can make them, I do not see where the delicacy comes in.

Mr. CLYMER. In reply to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Blaine,]
I would state that the court did not propose to ask us any questions at all. Those questions were to be asked by the grand jury. Had the questions been asked by the court in presence of the public I might not have had so great objection. But I felt, sir, that if we were to go before that tribunal whose proceedings are necessarily, according to law and precedent, always secret, then no matter what according to law and precedent, always secret, then no matter what might occur in the grand-jury room, if we once entered those portals, that mere fact would strike terror everywhere throughout this land and close all the avenues of evidence to this House and to its committee.

I will say further that the court did say that it was of opinion that the grand jury could not and should not ask us any questions which would tend to show what had been testified to before us in that committee. This question then arose in my mind: If they could not inquire with reference to anything that was testified to before that committee, why had they subpensed me or others of the committee at all, unless it was for the purpose of intimidating witnesses elsewhere f

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman knows perfectly well—
Mr. CLYMER. I have not done.
Mr. BLAINE. The gentlemen knows perfectly well that his own privilege protects him. There is not the least power in the world to compel the gentleman to testify. He cannot be arrested; no process can issue against him. Whether the gentleman shall appear and testify is a matter wholly for himself to determine.

Mr. CLYMER. I have said that we did not intend to plead our privilege so that it might not be said that we did not intend to plead our privilege so that it might not be said that we intended to exclude anything which should be rightfully known to the public.

Mr. LAMAR. I would be glad if the gentleman from Penusylvania would send up to the desk his subpæna, so that the House may be put in possession of the precise object of the court in issuing such a mandate to members of this House.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask the Clerk to read the subpœna.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the supreme court of the District of Columbia, holding a criminal court for said district the 6th day of March, 1876.

The President of the United States to Hiester Clymer, to bring all papers, documents, records, checks, contracts in your possession or in the possession of the Committee of the House of Representatives on Expenditures in the War Department in relation to the charge against said defendant of accepting a bribe or bribes while Secretary of War of the United States.

You are hereby commanded to attend the said court immediately to testify on behalf of the United States, and not depart the court without leave of the court or the district attorney.

Witness:

D. K. CARTTER, The President of the United States to HIESTER CLYMER, to bring all papers, docu-

D. K. CARTTER, Chief Justice of said Court. R. J. MEIGS, Clerk.

Mr. CLYMER. I will yield now to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I only wish to say, sir, that I went before the court, waiving my privilege as a member so far as to make a statement to that tribunal. North Carolinians believe it is the duty of every man to obey the mandates of the judiciary. For that reason, as a North Carolinian, I went there, not to plead my privithat reason, as a North Carolinian, I went there, not to plead my privi-lege as a Representative, but to say to the court, on behalf of myself and the other two gentlemen who appeared with me, that we be-lieved it would work serious detriment to the public interest if we were required to make known before any tribunal just now the secret transactions of our committee, the developments taking place there, our plans, and the probable results of our proceedings. We are engaged in investigations, the purpose of which is the purification of the public services a purpose in which every good efficient and honest man push service, a purpose in which every good citizen and honest man must wish us success. If we are required to disclose our transactions at the present stage, it will tend to defeat this object.

We protested that the district attorney, the grand jury, and the court, and not ourselves, must take the responsibility of causing the public injury which would result from our giving out the full information of what is now going on before our committee, and of what

I told the court for myself that if, notwithstanding what I now communicated, they shall still require me to go before their grand jury and testify, I should do so; and I will unless this House shall instruct me otherwise. I therefore hope the House will give me instructions as a member of a committee engaged in most important investigations as to what I should do under the circumstances.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to this House, that the inevitable effect of our being required to testify as to what transpires in the ses-effect of our being required to testify as to what transpires in the sessions of our committee before a grand jury or anywhere else will be, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] has stated, to intimidate witnesses, stop their mouths, and throttle all further investigations. I say here, if it is not the design it certainly will be the result of the course now being taken by certain officials of this District under the promptings of the head of the Government to break down investigations by shutting the mouths of witnesses. If that is not the purpose it is the effect, unless this House takes the matter in hand and provides for the protection (not of us; we need no protect hand and provides for the protection (not of us; we need no protection; we have nothing to withhold or conceal as committeemen)—the protection of the witnesses who shall come before us.

Mr. DANFORD. As a member of the committee, Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask a question of the chairman. I will say, however, that I had no subpæna to go before the court, and that I know nothing of this matter which has been brought before the House. I understand the chairman of the committee to state to the House that it would be fatal to the ends of justice if the committee were compelled to go into a court of justice and detail the testimony of witnesses before I understood him to make that statement. I desire to ask the chairman a question as to what testimony there has been given before the committee that has not been fully reported to this House and to the country? As I understood the report of the committee made on last Thursday, it contained every syllable of testimony apper-taining to the matter reported to the House and proposed to be inquired into in the District court, before which these gentlemen were subpœnaed. I simply desire to ask the question to know what testimony the committee has that has not yet been reported to the House.

Mr. LAMAR. I desire to answer that question in my own manner.
Mr. LAMAR. I rise to a point of order, and my point of order is that the chairman has no right to reveal to the House in this way what has transpired in the committee.

Mr. DANFORD. I may have been misunderstood. If there has been any testimony which has not been reported, I do not ask it be revealed, but I desire to know of the chairman whether there was any testimony taken in this matter which has not been reported?

Mr. BLAINE. That is right.
Mr. DANFORD. For, as I understand, it has been all reported.
Mr. LAMAR. I insist on my point of order.
Mr. BLAINE. What conceivable motive can the gentleman have for insisting on his point of order? There is no possibility of asking a question more guarded than that.

Mr. LAMAR. The motive I have is the preservation of the order and decorum of this body. I maintain the gentleman has no right under the rules to reveal to the House whether there is other testimony before the committee. Other testimony may have come before that committee since the report was made.

Mr. BLAINE. There is no asking any such testimony shall be disclosed.

Mr. CLYMER. I believe I have the floor.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor.
Mr. CLYMER. I trust my friend from Mississippi will not insist on his question of order, for the reason, sir, that I can say here that there is no testimony before that committee now which is not known to every one. Furthermore, I did not say to the court, or to the House that it would be the disclosure of that testimony which would work injury to the public interest. I said here was the threat to everybody who would have to come in the future before that committee that would be the basis of indictment. That is what I said to this House, and what I said to the court, and what I say to the courty.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. CLYMER. Not now. I stated to this House, and I repeat again, that this attempt to drag forth what occurs in committee can result in nothing else but detriment to the public weal.

Mr. BLAINE. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit me, wish to say this—

Mr. CLYMER. I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. LAMAR. Allow me to say that I misunderstood the question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DANFORD] when I objected to an answer being given to it.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I withdraw what I said in regard to the gentleman's objection. I desire to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] that I merely desired the courtesy of being allowed to put a question.

Mr. CLYMER. I yield willingly for that purpose.

Mr. BLAINE. What I want is this: that there shall be no division. or seeming division, between the two sides of the House in regard to or seeming division, between the two sides of the House in regard to the vigorous prosecution of anything that is brought here in the shape of public crime. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, if I understood him, seems to impute, and indeed directly imputes, a purpose to somebody in this District to intimidate witnesses and to stifle justice. Now, what is the object of this investigation?

Mr. CLYMER. I permitted the gentleman from Maine only to ask me a question.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. BLAINE. I am coming to the question. I want the gentleman to tell me what is the object of these investigations except to bring the offender to criminal justice. Will the gentleman answer me that question? What is the object of these proceedings except to bring offenders to justice?

Mr. CLYMER. I have stated the facts in this case to the House, and if an imputation necessarily arises that some one in this District wishes to close the avenues of evidence all over this land, is it not

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman closes them himself.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania does not yield.
Mr. CLYMER. And I will not permit the gentleman from Maine to impute to me motives which I do not understand or to put insinuations into my mouth that I have never uttered. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Black-

BURN.]
Mr. BLACKBURN. I am not surprised, sir, at the uneasiness manifested and the nervousness displayed by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] who seeks to inject his speeches into every man's utterances upon this side of the House. Did I hold the same questionable position in this matter as gentlemen on the other side by reason of the complicity of their prominent officials, I at least would be disposed to sympathize with him and share his apprehensions,

I do not like to charge that it is the purpose of the Executive of this country to intimidate witnesses, to throttle investigation, and to this country to intimidate witnesses, to throttle investigation, and to afford immunity from punishment to publicly convicted criminals. But I do say this, that this is the result, and unless this gag process is stopped the country will believe and I will believe that such is the purpose. [Cries of "O!" "O!" from the republican side of the House.] I say this, and I say it by way of a personal explanation: The committee of which I am a member has been subjected to criticisms and to censures to which it is not amenable, in matters for which it is not responsible. It has gone forth to the country that they have connived at the abscending of an important witness. It is charged connived at the absconding of an important witness. It is charged through the public prints of the country, and that without contra-diction, that that witness was allowed to leave this capital by the majority of the democratic members of the committee, in spite of the protest of the republican members of the committee. That charge it is needless for me to say is false, flatly false, and the only wonder is that the honorable republican members of the committee have allowed it to go for one hour upon their authority without giving it their contradiction. It is not proper probably for me to state all that happened in that committee-room.

I will not undertake to say who it was that prosecuted this investigation from its inception to its conclusion. I will not say that no member of a certain political organization from the day that Congress convened until this proof was all in, signed and sealed, ever crossed the threshold of that committee-room. I will not say that crossed the threshold of that committee-room. I will not say that. But if it is true let the gentlemen answer whom it strikes. But I will say this: that upon the floor of the House the other day—and the Record bears me out in this—I did those gentlemen of the other side of the House upon that committee more than justice by my silence. I then said they had agreed upon this report as promptly as the democratic members. I did not say more. Whether it was because I could not truthfully I leave the country to infer.

Now, sir, witnesses that are summoned and subnegged before invented.

Now, sir, witnesses that are summoned and subpænaed before investigating committees must be protected, otherwise they will not come. We could not hold this witness any longer. He had answered every question that had ever been propounded. He had been turned over, question that had ever been propounded. He had been turned over, as the record shows, for cross-examination to the late Secretary of War and his counsel. He had been by them cross-examined. The report was in. The proof was complete. It would have been the exercise of an arbitrary power; we would have been guilty not only of assault, but we would have been guilty of bad faith, if we had sought to detain him longer. We came to this House while that witness was within the walls of this Capitol. We made our report, and stated the facts, as that report will show. The witness was then within the power of the House. He was subject to the order of Congress. We reported the facts while he was still lingering about your We reported the facts while he was still lingering about your portals, and the House did not order his continuance in arrest, and no member of that committee ever asked it.

But, sir, this is equally true, that if the order has gone forth to the country, as it is given by the press, that the Executive of this great Government, surrounded by his council, has directed the prosecution of this man who appeared here as a witness and with testimony whose crushing weight the country has felt throughout its farthest lengths; if, in addition to the declaration of such persons, any man who testifirst against those who have been guilty of malfeasance in office is to be notified in advance that on his disclosures he is to be prosecuted and sent to the penitentiary, and that is to be supplemented by the assertion that no member of Congress shall hesitate to go before the inquisitorial tribunals of this District, it will then be understood that all witnesses are not only to be made the victims of partisan persecution, but that the very tribunals of this Congress before which they appear are going to turn upon them and prosecute them in the courts. Sir, it is utterly impossible that we can ever convict the Secretary of War or any Cabinet or other officer unless we find the facts from his accomplices; and now you propose to tell us an accomplice shall not come here, or that if he does he does it at his own peril, warned in advance that not only the power of the Government will be wielded to send him to prison, but that the committee before which he appears shall come as the chief witnesses against him.

It is this that I protest against, and I want here to say that if the executive or the civil officers who are now engaged in directing and aiding and furthering this prosecution expect the country to receive it as an honest effort to reform, stripped of all purpose save that of inflicting honest and legal punishment, they are deceived; the country will not say it, the country will not think it; and they know themselves that it is not so.

It is of no use to tell us it will do no good to the country that a democratic House and a democratic committee, after having ferreted out crime and prosecuted the criminal to conviction, have been guilty of a dereliction of duty, that there was an easing of the prosecution on our part. They will be especially unable to persuade the masses of the American people that it is an honest system of Government under which such practices can find shelter. The country want to know these facts; this committee on investigation want to furnish it is proper and right that the House should pass a resolution that no member of the House sitting as a member of an investigating committee shall be allowed, if in his judgment it would be detrimental to the public interest, to be called before the grand jury or any court to the public interest, to be called before the grand jury or any court to give testimony on any subject then pending before his committee. Mr. Speaker, the phrase "let no guilty man escape" the country will now say means let no man escape who is guilty of telling upon those in authority. Give us the widest margin, open the doors, and give immunity to every witness who comes to tell anything that bears upon the misdeeds of the Administration, and you will find this but the beginning of the end; and in this appeal I address myself to the domestration of the end; and in this appeal I address myself not to democrats or to republicans; I address myself to honest men everywhere. Let the investigation be as broad as it is possible to make it. As a committee of the House we ask this at your hands. We warn you now that the investigation in which we are engaged, voluminous as it is becoming, will be stopped; it will be impossible to carry it further successfully, unless you declare that the testimony of members of a committee shall not be used against witnesses for the purpose of their conviction.

Mr. CLYMER. I yield now to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr.

Mr. PAGE. How does the gentleman have the right to yield the

Mr. KASSON. I rise to a question of order, and it is that there is no question before the House that can justify the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Clymer] in holding the floor and designating who may and who may not speak.

Mr. LAMAR. I have a resolution to offer.

Mr. KASSON. I have one to offer, if any are to be offered.

Mr. LAMAR. I have no doubt the gentleman will concur with me.

Mr. CLYMER. I trust the resolution may be reported.

Mr. LAMAR. Before my resolution is reported, I should like to make a remark or two. I do not think this is a question pertaining merely to the delicacy or personal privilege of members, nor is it one upon which there should be any party feeling or excitement. In the pres-ence of such solemn events as are now throwing their shadows over this House, it seems to me the voice of faction for a moment at least should be hushed.

I regard this mandate, or summons, or subpœna, whatever it may be called, which has been issued to the members of that committee by the supreme court of this District as an outrage upon the privileges of this House in the persons of the members of that committee. I do not say that such was the object of the court, nor do I mean to intimate—I mean to disclaim any intimation of the sort—that it is prompted by any purpose to hush up or to suppress investigations. The question is one purely of parliamentary privilege, whether or not the members of this House and of the committees of this House are amenable to the processes of the criminal court for the purpose of testifying and bringing the papers and the records that are in the various committee-rooms before the courts for investigation and for revision

Mr. BLAINE. Nobody says they are.
Mr. LAMAR. "Nobody says they are," says the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Blaine.] Then if nobody says they are, ought not this House to take some measures to protect the privileges which have been invaded by this summons?

Mr. BLAINE. It is no violation of privilege.

Mr. LAMAR. No violation to issue a summons to a member of this House commanding him to bring all the records of a committee of this body before that court, and to command him there to remain and not depart until the court or the district attorney shall allow him to do so! Suppose that a member of this House should waive his privilege; suppose he should go there and take these papers. How long lege; suppose he should go there and take these papers. How long would it be before the District court, if it should choose to do so, would relieve us of the power and forever deprive our committees of the opportunity to investigate?

Mr. BLAINE. Allow me a question.

Mr. LAMAR. Certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. Does not the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] see, and does not the entire country see, that, having possession of all the evidence upon which an indictment can be found, having every fact of the guilt of this party in its possession this House puts every fact of the guilt of this party in its possession, this House puts itself behind its privilege when it says this court shall not view that evidence, and throws itself across the indictment of Belknap; and that to-day this House stands as the obstacle and the sole obstacle in the way of the indictment of the late Secretary of War?

Mr. LAMAR. Neither "the gentleman from Mississippi," nor the country, nor the gentleman from Maine sees any such thing.

Mr. BLAINE. I see nothing but that.

Mr. LAMAR. It is everything but that; that does not touch it anywhere. The question is simply this: Can this House permit its records to be at the beck and call of the District court? Shall it do it? There is no doubt about the fact that when an investigation is completed, when the articles of impeachment are presented and the case them with these facts. The question for the House to determine is shall we be thwarted in our purpose either by the Executive and his Cabinet or by the petty criminal courts of this District?

We have a right to subpena the President of the United States and make him testify, and there should be immunity given to every witness who testifies before an investigating committee, and I think that missed the witness and reported all the facts to the House. And now, according to the doctrine of the gentleman, they propose to keep possession of all the papers and testimony concerning the guilt of this man, and shut the doors of the congressional committee-room under this miserable pretense of privilege and shield him against criminal prosecution; for that is the effect of the action proposed here to-day. Mr. LAMAR. Such is not the effect of it, and no one knows that

Mr. LAMAR. Such is not the effect of it, and no one knows that better than the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BLAINE. I know nothing else.

Mr. LAMAR. The statement is utterly destitute of foundation, and the gentleman from Maine, if he goes not know it, ought to be sufficiently advised of parliamentary procedure to know that when a tribunal of the country has jurisdiction of a case, when it is proceeding with that case, it is not within the power even of a co-ordinate tribunal, especially an appointee of the Executive, to come in and order the entire records of that committee to be taken from it and the memthe entire records of that committee to be taken from it, and the members of that committee to appear before it; otherwise what would be the effect? Every single investigation could be suppressed in limine. I do not say that that is the object. I do not even suggest that such is the purpose. But to say that this House is bound to allow its papers, the members of the House, the members of its committees, to be called away from their duties to go before a court and reveal each step they have taken, is a proposition not only monstrous, but it is preposterous and ridiculous.

Mr. BLAINE. Allow me a moment.

Mr. LAMAR. Not now. Mr. BLAINE. Just one

Just one moment.

Mr. LAMAR. I would be glad to finish my statement.
Mr. BLAINE. If the gentleman will permit me one moment, I agree with him entirely that to interrupt the proceeding in limine is a thing that would not be tolerated, nor has the court of the District of Columbia any power whatever to go to a committee-room, either

when the investigation has begun—

Mr. LAMAR. This court has come to the committee-room.

Mr. BLAINE. The court has no power whatever in the matter.

This House is supreme. The question is whether the House will permit that testimony to go. The House can refuse it or it can send it there. I dare, I dare that side of the House to refuse it. [Loud applease of the workline sides rise of "Conderly" on the decoration. plause on the republican side; cries of "Order!" on the democratic

Mr. LAMAR. O, gentlemen, you are doing yourselves injustice by making such demonstrations upon a pure question of constitutional and parliamentary law.

Mr. WHITE. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will eutertain no motion until the House is in order. [After a pause.] The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] will now state his point of order.

Mr. WHITE. My point is that this clapping of hands is all out of order. [Laughter.] The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Lamar] will proceed.

Mr. LAMAR. I hope that the point of order will be overruled. This demonstration is about the only forcible thing that I have yet heard presented in opposition to this assertion of the privileges of this House against an attempted invasion. I do not blame gentlemen for applauding, for it is about the only thing that I have heard yet on that side that has any point in it.

In reply to the defiance of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] I will tell him that no threat or menace, either of language or manner on his part, or any challenge, can prevent me or the gentlemen with whom I am associated from asserting our constitutional rights in this House as a body. I present a resolution which asserts those in this House as a body. I present a resolution which asserts those rights, and which I hope will maintain them.

There can be no question about the right of the criminal courts to carry on their prosecution of an offender at the same time that we prosecute him by impeachment, but they have not the right to invade the precincts of this House—this House which can impeach that judge himself. Suppose, sir, that in the prosecution of this "safe-burglary" case matter should come up which would touch the honesty and integrity of a member of the court, and he should at once issue his mandate upon the committee sitting here investigating that matter, and as soon as the witnesses were dismissed order that committee to come before him to bring all their papers, all telegrams, all testimony, all receipts, everything that any witness had said before them; would the gentleman from Maine get up then, and in that way which is characteristic only of himself cry out, "I dare you to withhold the information?" Sir, this House, I presume, dares to do what is right, dares to do what is honest, dares to maintain its constitutional privileges, and to continue the prosecution of this investigation.

Sir, I have presented a resolution which I had supposed would meet the assent of every gentleman present. This case has not been finished. Other testimony must come before the committee. One of the witnesses, from causes which have been variously alleged, has disappeared. Other testimony will have to come before the committee. It is impossible that these investigations should go an if there tee. It is impossible that these investigations should go on if they are to be subject to the vexing and constant interposition of the criminal courts. I ask that the resolution be read and adopted.

Mr. PAGE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Lamar] one question before the resolution is read. I wish to inquire whether he knows any way by which Mr. Belknap, late Secretary of War, can be indicted for his crimes except upon the very Mr. BLACKBURN. I will say to the gentleman that there is not an atom of testimony now in the possession of the committee.

Mr. LAMAR. He can be indicted, of course, by the production of the witnesses

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Speaker of this House did, on the 20th of December, 1875, appoint the following Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, to wit: Hiester Clymer, William M. Robens, Joseph C. S. Blackburn, Lyman K. Bass, Lorezzo Danfoid; and whereas thereafter, on the 14th of January, 1876, this House adopted the following resolution:

CLYMER, WILLIAM M. ROBBINS, JÖSEPH C. S. BLACKBUIN, LYMAN K. BASS, LOHENZO DANFORD; and whereas thereafter, on the 14th of January, 1876, this House adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the several committees of this House having in charge matters pertaining to appropriations, foreign affairs, Indian affairs, military affairs, naval affairs, post-office and post-roads, public lands, public buildings and grounds, claims and war claims, be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire, so far as the same may properly be before their respective committees, into any errors, abuses, or frauds that may exist in the administration and execution of existing laws affecting said branches of the public service, with a view to ascertain what change and reformation can be made so as to promote integrity, economy, and efficiency therein; that the Committees on Expenditures in the State Department, in the Post-Office Department, in the United Popartment, in the Department, in the Post-Office Department, in the Interior Department, in the Department of Justice, and on Public Buildings, be, and they are hereby, instructed to proceed at once, as required by the reles of the House, to examine into the state of the accounts and expenditures of the respective Departments submitted to them, and to examine are justified by law; whether the claims from time to time satisfied and discharged by the respective Departments are supported by sufficient vouchers, establishing their justness both as to their character and amount; whether such claims have been discharged out of funds appropriated therefor, and whether all moneys have been discharged out of funds appropriated therefor, and whether any, and what, provisions are necessary to be adopted to provide more perfectly for the proper application of the public moneys and to secure the Government from demands unjust in their character or extravagant in their amount; whether any, and what, retrenchment can be made in the expenditures of the several Departments, without detriment and shall have the same authority that is conferred upon the other committees aforesaid."

And whereas in the discharge of the duties imposed by said order the said Committee on Expenditures in the War Department did enter upon an examination into the said accounts of said Department and into the administration thereof, and did send for persons and papers to investigate certain acts of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, on which being reported to this House by said committee it has taken action to impeach the said William W. Belknap of high crimes and misdemeanors; and whereas the supreme court of the District of Columbia, by process bearing date March 6, 1876, has commanded HESTER CLYMER to "bring all papers, documents, records, checks, and contracts in your possession, or in the possession of the Committee of the House of Representatives on Expenditures in the War Department, in relation to the charge against said defendant of accepting a bribe or bribes while Secretary of War of the United States, and to attend the said court immediately to testify on behalf of the United States, and not depart from the court without leave of the court or district-attorneys;" and whereas the mandate of said court is a breach of the privileges of this House:

*Resolved*, That the said committee and the members thereof are hereby directed to disregard said mandate until the further order of this House.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I think it will not be unwise for the House to look for a little while coolly at the situation which has been

House to look for a little while coolly at the situation which has been developed this morning before taking that, or any other order, in the premises inconsistent with the ordinary proceedings of law.

The question is raised here as a question of privilege. It is presented to the House as a breach of the privilege at least of one member of this House, that he received a judicial invitation to aid in the development of a crime and the punishment of a criminal. The further extraordinary fact appears that this invitation is to aid in the prosecution and conviction of one whom the very objecting party have prosecution and conviction of one whom the very objecting party have declared and reported to this House as a criminal against the United States. And it was also declared by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that you might search the volumes of universal history and find no crime which would be a parallel to this. Now, when the Executive of this Government, sworn solemnly to enforce the laws, finds in the Revised Statutes a clause that punishes by fine and imprison-ment in the penitentiary the very offense they have reported to this House to have been committed, several gentlemen on that side of the House rise in their places and implore the House to do what? To protect them from aiding in the punishment by the courts of that crime!

Mr. Speaker, I say the condition is an extraordinary one. It is one without precedent, but with precedents directly to the contrary. I recollect, sir, after the Pacific mail investigation was reported to this House and proceedings were instituted in the court of this District in like manner, criminal proceedings for the punishment of the parties reported to have been guilty of crime, two members of the House Committee on Ways and Means were summoned to give their testimony. What did they do? Did they come to this House to beg they might not be required to tell what they knew? On the contrary, they appeared before that tribunal, gave their evidence like citizens of this great country, all of whom were interested in the punishment of crime, and no appeal was made to the House to protect them

Mr. Speaker, if it be a question of personal privilege, what more do gentlemen want than the protection of the Constitution, which says that they are privileged from arrest, and the authorities which declare that they are also privileged from obeying any process, disobedience to which may be punished by arrest? They need not go before this tribunal unless they desire to do so. If they say, for any reason whatever, that they do not wish to be required to tell what they know whatever, that they do not wish to be required to tell what they know in aid of the punishment of a crime, let them then say so to the court, and no process can come to them in this Hall or at their rooms in this city to arrest them. They will find it written in the Manual. They will find it in the Constitution. Why, then, is this question presented in this peculiar manner this morning, arraigning the President of the United States—for that is what they have done—as endeavoring to defeat the course of justice by directing the prosecution of criminals? Was there ever a proposition made to the House like this—an arraignment of the sworn Executive of the laws because he had directed his ment of the sworn Executive of the laws because he had directed his subordinates to enforce the laws of the land? Suppose it had been the counterproposition. Suppose it was charged that the Executive had set these officers to prosecute A and B, and to leave C and D unprosecuted. The howl that would have been raised against it would have been more violent than anything we have heard in this Hall this

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. It ran pretty high here this morn-

Mr. KASSON. The truth is that that officer could have done nothing else. He had no right to distinguish between offenses and offenders against the laws of the land. He would have been guilty of a gross abuse of his constitutional duty if he had dared to do it, and gentlemen know it. The grand jury are sworn to indict men guilty of crime within their jurisdiction; and this committee and this House have no right to embarrass them in the execution of the laws of the land. The whole object of the proceeding this morning, as it cannot possibly have the cffect of securing members of this House from a breach of their privilege—the Constitution and the Manual tell them their rights—the whole object, it seems to me, is to raise a cloud upon the action of the Executive, which you all know to have been constitutional and just, and under that cloud to cover up one of the greatest blunders which has been committed by an investigating committee since I have been a member of this House; and that blunder is that before you have got your criminals you discharge your witnesses, paying them off and letting them go to Canada.

Mr. BEEBE. Mr. Speaker—
Mr. KASSON. I have not finished yet. I call the attention of the House to this fact, that this subpena is not a process to obtain either the records of the House or the secrets of the House. The House has no secrets. The House has not been in secret session upon this subject. If it had, of course there could be no revelation. The subpena does not call for a record of this House because this House has no record except what is open to the public. And when the gentle-man from Mississippi [Mr. Lamar] speaks of it as calling for the records and papers of this House he makes an error in his statement. There are certain members of this House who have had opportunity, as their own report shows, to hear personal statements made touching a high official of this country, which statements it is alleged go to prove his guilt.

Mr. CLYMER. Will the gentleman permit me—

Mr. KASSON. In a moment. And the demand is made here that, having allowed Marsh to escape, and they being the only repository of the confessions of the criminals, the grand jury shall not have the benefit of the facts to make an indictment.

Mr. CLYMER. Will the gentleman from Iowa permit me to say this: He certainly could not have heard or did not remember my statement made before the House and in behalf of the committee that there was no evidence before that committee touching this case but what was in possession of this House. And when he states that we have in our possession other evidence in reference to a late officer of this Government, he states inadvertently it may be, but at least he states what is absolutely untrue.

Mr. McCRARY. Before my colleague [Mr. Kasson] proceeds, I wish to ask him if he does not know, as every gentleman on the floor knows, that there is in the possession of that committee a written contract, which is the foundation, and must be the foundation, of any proceedings for the indictment of this offender? It is in their possession, and it is probably the very thing that this subpena is intended to bring before the grand jury.

Mr. CLYMER. Will the gentleman permit me to make a statement right here? The contract referred to is a contract between Marsh and Evans. It is between them alone, and Marsh expressly states that the Secretary of War knew nothing of it when it was made, and knew nothing of it for two years afterward, and had never seen it.

Mr. KASSON. I thank my colleague and the gentleman from Pennsylvania for both of their suggestions. And the gentleman from Pennsylvania must not confuse the "him" as the member from Pennsylvania with the "him" as a member of that committee. As a member of this House from Pennsylvania he may have had a dozen conversations with parties charged with crime of which the committee know nothing. It is reported by the committee that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Blackburn] did have personal conversations, and at great length, involving this very matter, and not before the committee

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman allow me a word? He mis-

represents me

Mr. KASSON. I take it as reported in your own record that the witness Tomlinson testified that you had a conversation with parties involved in the facts reported by the committee.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have this to say, that when the gentleman from Iowa makes the statement that it was reported by this committee that I had conversations with Mrs. Belknap and at great length, following the example—which I certainly think worthy of imita-tion—set me in the other wing of the Capitol, I commission the gen-tleman from Iowa whenever he hears any man make such a statement as that to say that he has my authority for telling that man he LIES.

[Great applause.]
Mr. KASSON. Do I understand the gentleman from Kentucky
[Mr. Blackburn] to say that he had no conversation upon the subject involved in this criminality outside of the committee-room, and with no party involved in the report of the committee?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer that question. I have filed a statement which neither the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] nor any other gentleman will impugn.

Mr. KASSON. But I appeal to that statement.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I had a conversation with Mrs. Belknap, and that fact is on record and has gone to the country.

Mr. KASSON. If it is sufficiently important to the case to have been reported and made public why should not the criminal courts be entitled to the banquet. [Laughter and applause on the republican entitled to the banquet. [Laughter and applause on the republican side of the House.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire further to say that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] ought to know that no contract referred to by his colleague nor any other paper in this case in the shape of proof is in he possession of this committee at all. It is in the possession of the House, to which it was reported.

And now will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] allow me to ask him a question? I find a report in the newspapers of the country to the effect that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] with his colleagues waited in a body on the fallen Secretary. [Laughter.]

Mr. KASSON. I will answer that question with more cheerfulness than the gentleman answered mine.

ness than the gentleman answered mine.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I trust he will tell us what then occurred, and whether he is the repository of a confession from the late Secretary of War. [Laughter.]

Mr. KASSON. I will respond to a subpœna to give any statement of what I know in aiding the prosecution against Mr. Belknap. [Applause.] Will the gentleman do as much?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Well, sir, I appeared in court this morning.

Mr. KASSON. But will you plead your privilege.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have already said that I appeared in court this morning and expressly stated to the court that I did not plead privilege, but if forced to become a party to the disreputable effort of privilege, but if forced to become a party to the disreputable effort of your President to gag a respectable witness, I would put my protest against it on record in the American Congress and send it before the

Mr. KASSON. I hope the gentlemen on the other side will allow that I have been more liberal in yielding to interruptions than they were. Let me recur to the question I was discussing. I say that the prosecuting officers of the Government, in the performance of their sworn duty, investigating crime, the beginning of which was developed by the Committee on the Expenditures of the War Department, are proceeding exactly in accordance with law before the tribunal certallished by law and the question way reconstituted to the University of the Committee of the Co established by law, and the question now presented to the House is, Shall the House withhold the aid in its power, or shall any member of the House refuse his aid to secure the punishment of this criminal?

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. KASSON. Let me finish what I was saying. I affirm that in this state of facts this House cannot afford to put itself on record as obstructing the course of justice.

So far as the allegation that this discourages men from giving testimony is concerned, every lawyer in the House knows that the moment an indictment or an impeachment is presented an alarm is sprung to some extent; and in the given case of Marsh it was well understood that the man fled before notification of the impeachment had been presented to the Senate, or even to the House; that is nothing but an excuse. Mr. BLAINE. V

Will the gentleman from Iowa allow me to inter-

mr. KASSON. Certainly.
Mr. KASSON. I merely want, by the indulgence and kindness of the gentleman from Iowa, to state—and I want the country to understand it—that there is no question pending before the criminal court of this District affecting any other person than William W. Belknap in relation to this matter.

Mr. BLACKBURN. How do you know?

Mr. BLAINE. These gentlemen are not summoned to give testi-mony in the case of any witness whatever.

Now, these gentlemen made a final report of this case and wound it up by moving an impeachment, and the impeachment article in the Constitution expressly guarantees that the guilty party shall be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law, and the President of the United States in pursuance of his duty sent these men before a judicial tribunal, and the judicial tribunal sent up a summons here asking this House to let them know the testimony that they thought grave enough upon which to found an im-

And then we have the miserable backing and filling, shuffling, and pretense that somebody's privilege is invaded. I undertake to say that from 1789 down to this moment there never was so paltry a plea put in anywhere. Every one knows that a summons issued to a member of Congress goes upon the explicit understanding that he can respond to it or not, because, except in case of treason, felony, and breach of the peace, he is constitutionally exempt from arrest. When these gentlemen come in here and pretend that their sacred privileges were invaded it is a little laughable. They could walk the streets unmolested. The whole question for these gentlemen originally, and for the House, as they have now transferred it to the House, is whether we will stand as a bar to the prosecution in the criminal courts of the late Secretary of War or whether we will furnish all the testimony in our possession.

And the question I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] is this: How, in his judgment, would it have looked before the country if the republican party had come in here this morning and interposed this pitiful evasion with the idea that they might skulk behind it, and in some way save a member of their party?

Mr. KASSON. It would look as if we had gone over to the democracy. [Laughter.] I now yield to the gentleman from North Carolina for a question or a brief statement.

Mr. BORRING of North Carolina Mr. Robert is this that there is

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. My point is this, that there is a great deal of pettifogging here about the position of different gentlemen of different parties. I do not care about that; but I want to ask one square question as an American citizen.

Mr. KASSON. Good; do it.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. Is not the necessary effect of inquiring of members of this House upon investigating committees as to what has been testified in regard to matters before them, when a witness may be subject to indictment for bribing public officers is not the necessary effect of such inquiries before any tribunal while the investigations are in progress to intimidate witnesses? And fur-ther, does not the gentleman see that it is not ourselves that we ask to be protected, but that it is the witnesses we have before us by the dozen, and who are about to be scared away from here by this thing?

[Laughter and applause.]
Mr. KASSON. That is pretty well put under the circumstances.
[Renewed laughter.] But I ask at the same time if the country will not say of a committee that takes that ground, especially where three of them had this particular information some time before the other two had any knowledge of it, that their object is to make a disagreeable odor in the political atmosphere, and not to enforce justice according

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I ask the gentleman if he will

Mr. KASSON. I always yield to the gentleman from North Carolina for a question.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy. I do not often trespass upon it. This is what I say: This case will keep until we have tried the late Secretary of War where he ought first to be tried.

Mr. KASSON. That is just what I thought the day of the impeachment; that the impeachment would keep at least over night; but they thought it would not, and hurried it right through under the they thought it would not, and hurried it right through under the previous question.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I beg the gentleman to hear me. Mr. KASSON. The more you examine into the reasons for this the more you find that this business of intimidating witnesses has no effect upon "the dozens that are waiting on the committees." And why? Because by law they are protected against having their testimony used against them; they are perfectly protected.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. Will the gentleman allow me another question?

Mr. KASSON. Certainly.

Mr. KASSON. Certainly.
